THE FOURTH LABOUR OF HERCULES.

Frontispiece to the 45th Volume of the Sporting Magazine.

THIS classical subject is so well known, as scarcely to need recital. The Fourth Labour of Hercules was to bring alive to Eurystheus a wild boar that ravaged the neighbourhood of Erymanthus. In this expedition he destroyed the Centaurs, and caught the boar, by closely pursuing him through the deep snow. Eurystheus was so frightened at the sight of the bear, that he hid himself in his brazen vessel for some days.

THE HINDOO JUGGLERS.

MR. Forbes, who resided many years in our Indian settlements, has, in his Oriental Memoirs, lately published, noticed the jugglers of those countries in the following terms:—

"I was frequently amused at the public wells and halting places," says he, "by the jugglers, who generally found out the encampments of the travelling merchants. There they spread their carpets, and performed feats of legerdemain gerdemain superior to any I have seen in England; the most conspicuous was generally one of those women mentioned by Dr. Fryer, who held nine gilded balls in play, with her hands and feet and the muscles of her arms and legs, for a long time together, without letting them fall. These people also enable me to confirm another anecdote which I could not have so scientifically described. This observing traveller says, 'I saw a man who swallowed a chain such as our jacks have, and made it clink in his stomach; but on pulling it out, it was not so pleasant to the ladies, for whose diversion it was brought. Another, by suction and drawing of his breath, so contracted his lower belly, that it had nothing left to support it, but fell flat to his loins."

The following attempt to describe the extraordinary feats of the jugglers, now in England, may perhaps prove acceptable to the generality of our readers:—This exhibition of Indian talent takes place upon a raised platform, on which, having performed his salaam, or Eastern obeisance, the chief performer takes his seat; and behind him sits the second juggler, and an attendant boy, whose occupation is to beat two metallic plates, somewhat resembling cymbals, together, and emit an unremitting sound like the clucking of a hen.

The first tricks are performed with cups and balls. These are similar in their mode to the deceptions of our own conjurors, and only remarkable for the superiority of their execution under the hands of this celebrated Asiatic. The cups seem enchanted; the balls fly; they increase in number; they diminish; now one, now two, now none under the cup; and now the serpent, the cobra de capella, usurps the place of a small globule of cork, and winds its snaky folds as if from under the puny vessel. The facility with which this dexterous feat is accomplished gives life and animation to the sable countenance of the artist, whose arm is bared to the elbow, to shew that the whole is done by the sleight of hand. During his performances, the juggler keeps up an unremitting noise, striking his tongue against his teeth, like the clack of machinery, and uttering sounds, as if he were repeating, with inconceivable rapidity, the words, "crickery-tick, crickery-tick, crickery-tick, a-tow, geret tow, crickery-tick, a-tow, geret tow," &c.

The next feat is that of breaking a cotton thread into the consistency of scraped lint, as used by surgeons, and reproducing it continued and entire; after which he lays upon the palm of his hand a small quantity of common sand. This he rubs with the fingers of his other hand, and it changes its hue—the colourless grain becomes yellow; he rubs them again, they are white; again, and they are black.

A series of evolutions then succeeds with four hollow brass balls about the size of oranges. His power over these is almost miraculous. He causes them to describe every possible circle horizontally, perpendicularly, obliquely, transversely, round his legs, under his arms, about his head, in small and in large circumferences, with wondrous rapidity, and keeping the whole number in motion at the same time. This being the sole fruit of effort, activity, quickness of eye, and rapidity of action, no one one who has not witnessed it, can form an idea of its excellence.

Actapolo (or whatever is his name) then exhibits his astonishing powers of balancing. He places on his two major toes (over which he seems to have the same command that less favoured whites enjoy over their fingers only), a couple of thin rings of about four inches in diameter; a pair of similar rings he places on his fore fingers, and then sets the whole into rotation, and round they all whirl, and continue describing their orbits without cessation, as if set to work by machinery endowed by the principle of perpetual motion. Throwing himself back, the performer then balances a sword upon his forehead, and with his mouth strings a number of very small beads upon a hog's bristle, which he holds between his lips. All the wheels are kept in regular movement, the sword is nicely poised, and arts and manufactures (under the emblem of bead-stringing), carried on in peacefulness; for, during this part of the shew, the performer is compelled to be still and quiet.

Having concluded this, the juggler executes the following admirable exploit. Upon the tip of his nose he balances a small wooden parasol, from the circumference of which, about a dozen of cork tassels are pendant. With his mouth he inserts into each of these tassels a quill of about the length of twelve inches, and the thickness of that of the porcupine. The bases of these he places with his tongue between his upper lip and nose—the rings on his toes all the while performing their circuits. Having succeeded in putting a quill into every tassel, he takes out the centre stick on which the parasol was originally supported from the top of his nose, and it then remains balanced on the quills. Thus far the work is difficult enough; but this is nothing to its conclusion. He undermines his structures by a quill at a time, till only three remain. Of these he takes one way, and the top, which resembles the roof of a pagoda, swings down and hangs by two, the Indian preserving the astonishing balance even throughout this motion, which might be deemed sufficient to disconcert any human ingenuity; but even here he does not stop: the last prop but one is removed, and on that one the erect balance of the machine rests.

After a variety of other extraordinary performances, the Indian places a stone of fourteen pounds weight (about the size and shape of a Dutch cheese) between his feet. With an apparently slight exertion, he kicks up his heels, and the stone, performing a parabola over his head from behind, alights upon the bend of his arm, where it rests. He then tosses it to the same part of the other arm, where it rests, as if held by the hand or caught by magic; thence he throws it to various parts of his frame, to his wrist, and the back of his neck. At this latter point it might be supposed it would be stationary, as one feels very little capacity of twisting any weighty body from the neck in a direction different from what it would take on being shaken off. But even here our juggler commands its obedience. He again tosses it to his arm; back again to his neck; and after a few gambols of this sort, he finally, by a masterly jerk, throws this stone of fourteen pounds weight round his head.

The

The famous feat of swallowing the sword, closes this wonderful exhibition. Being performed by a juggler, most persons suppose there is some deception in it: but this is not the case, for this wonderful fellow actually and bona fide, before your eyes, palpably and fairly thrusts a spit, of nearly an inch in breadth and twenty in length, down his throat into his belly, and there leaves it sticking, with the handle (which is solid and not thicker than a lady's little finger, and therefore not capable of favouring any trick) out of his mouth. He draws the sword from this odd scabbard, makes his obeisance, and the performance ends.

SPORTING WITHOUT A QUALIFICATION.

An Action tried at the late Winchester Assizes.

George Henry Ward, Esq. v. John Hart, Gent.

THE plaintiff is Lord of the Manor of Northwood, in the Isle of Wight, and the defendant is an attorney at West Cowes. The defendant was in the habit of sporting with his dog and gun in and near the plaintiff's manor, which the latter considered he had no right to do, and therefore desired his attornies, Messrs. Clarkes, Sewell, and Hearn, of Newport, to write to him, which they did, requesting to know, on behalf of their client, what qualification he had to enable him to sport as he had done; in answer to which, the defendant not satisfying Mr. Ward's inquiries, wrote a letter to Clarkes and Sewell, which Mr. Ward considered to be very affronting, without stating his qualification; and, in addition to the strong language in the body of the letter, it contained the following postscript:—"We have lately been troubled with mad dogs, and it appears from your letter that your client must have been bitten."—The conduct of Mr. Hart induced the plaintiff to bring the present action, under the Game Laws, in order to put the defendant on a proof of his qualification, or rather to recover the penalty for his sporting without it. The plaintiff's gamekeeper, Bullock, proved that he saw the defendant kill a partridge, and put it in his pocket, which was the ground of the action. Mr. Jekyll displayed his usual wit and humour in cross-examining the witness, and also in afterwards addressing the Jury on the subject, telling them, that if the witness could not kill game, he could make game, and apparently came there to make game for his master; and, alluding to a green coat which the keeper wore, he observed, in the opening of his speech, that there was a pleasure in wearing green, which none but green-men knew; with many other jeers and witticisms, which excited much merriment and laughter. The defendant then proceeded to call witnesses, to prove that he was possessed of 100l. per annum, which qualified him under the statute. His property was proved by his tenants and others to be considerably more than this sum, in real annual value, but he having made a return under the Property Tax Act, for no more than 106l. the plaintiff's Counsel contended that the Jury ought to be governed in their verdict by that return, which, after deducting 20l. per annum, proved to be due for the interest of 400l. on mortgage of some of the premises, would leave the defendant with property (such as would qualify him him to sport) of only 86l. annual value, and, therefore, the plaintiff was entitled to a verdict. The learned Judge, Mr. Baron Graham, summed up the evidence at some length, and, after adverting to the difference which appeared between the actual value of the defendant's property, which he had proved "to support his dignity as a Gentleman," and that of his return under the Property Tax Act, "where called upon to contribute to the public funds of the country; his Lordship left it to the Jury, whether they would take the former or the latter amount into their consideration, as, in the first case, they must give a verdict for the defendant, and in the other, for the plaintiff.—The Jury, after a short consultation, gave a verdict for the defendant, thereby establishing his qualification.

THE ANGLER'S GUIDE;

Being a COMPLETE PRACTICAL TREATISE on ANGLING: containing the Whole Art of Trolling, Bottom-fishing, Fly-fishing, and Trimmer-angling, founded on forty years' Practice and Observation.—Second Edition, with very considerable Additions, Local Descriptions, Glossary of Technical Terms, and Index.—Illustrated with wood engravings.—Dedicated to her Royal Highness the Duchess of York.—By T. F. SALTER, Gent.

FEW persons will deny, that our stock of knowledge in the delightful pursuit of angling was capable of receiving an increase from modern skill and experience; and if that assumption be well grounded, it certainly must be desirable for the admirers of the amusement to possess a book, which exhibits the present state of knowledge at which the art has arrived, and furnishes a plain and practical guide to the young and untutored angler. Mr. Salter's book having passed through one edition, is some proof of its acceptability, and renders it the less necessary for us critically to analyse its merits: we may, however, remark, that the author's directions and observations are concisely and perspicuously expressed, and that the good sense which pervades them is the best criterion of their being the result of real practical experience. The wood cuts are in general exceedingly well executed.—We design extracting a few pages, beginning with an

"APOLOGY FOR ANGLERS.

"Many persons consider angling as cruel and reprehensible, and feelingly describe the sufferings and torture endured by the harmless and unoffending fish, when on the angler's hook. I certainly am ready to give those persons every credit for their humanity, and the purity of their motives, but at the same time differ widely from them on the subject; and I think, were the question put to them, whether we should abandon the cod fisheries on the score of humanity, they would pause before they answered in the affirmative: yet, what is the cod-fishery but angling on a larger scale? Every cod that smokes upon our board has been caught by a line and hook, and every turbot (the pride of our tables) has been obtained by the same means. Surely, then, if it is not a crime to angle for fish of a larger class (inhabitants of the ocean) it cannot be criminal to take the smaller kind that abound in

in our rivers. This angling on a large scale is, moreover, of such importance in a political point of view, that I think few indeed would willingly have it abandoned because the fish may suffer pain when they are hooked. The nursery which the Newfoundland cod-fishery affords of hardy seamen, accustomed to danger, and, in the hour of adversity, our best hope, may be reckoned as no trifling advantage resulting from the use of the baited hook.

" That angling is justifiable, and may be practised without offence to God or man, I trust I can show, by a reference to that authority which man holds the highest. Ws find fishermen were among the chosen servants of our Saviour, both before and after the resurrection; and in various parts of the Old and New Testament, fishermen, angles and hooks, are mentioned, but in no instance is the practice condemned, even by implication: we find in the book of Job, and in the prophet Amos, fishermen and fishing-hooks named; and, again, in the nineteenth chapter of Isaiah, it is said, " the fishers shall mourn, and they that cast their angle in the brook."

" Our blessed Lord made choice of several fishermen for his apostles (no fewer than four out of the twelve), and it was to those he appeared after his resurrection, while they were fishing, as may be seen by referring to the twenty-first chapter of St. John's gospel; and in order to convince the most incredulous that catching fish with hooks was never considered a sinful pursuit, I shall quote our Saviour's order given to the apostle St. Peter: " Go thou to the sea, and cast an hook, and take up the fish that first cometh."—St. Matthew, chap. xvii.

" In respect to the cruelty of angling, it is more ideal than real; and even that beautiful passage in Shakespeare which I have sometimes heard repeated by the enemies of angling, will not apply here:

" '—— The poor beetle that we tread upon,
In corporal sufferance finds a pang as great
As when a giant dies.' "

" For fish are cold-blooded animals, and not susceptible of that acute sense of pain which other animals are: if it were otherwise, the live baits which are used in angling, could never live so long on the hook as they do, and the instances of lively, healthy fish being caught, which bear about them the marks of having been formerly hooked, would not be so numerous. But, for mere argument, allowing it to be cruel, these advocates of the finny race might as well protest against the knocking down of a bullock, or the sticking of a sheep, or the wringing the neck of a fowl, on account of its cruelty, as against the hooking of a trout, or the spearing of an eel.

" Indeed, were the inhabitants of the streams a harmless, inoffensive race towards each other, something more might be said against the cruelty of destroying them; but, if we contrast the cruelty of the angler with the unceasing persecution which the finny tribe carry on against each other, his depredation upon them would sink into nothing. Every species of fish, either in the ocean, ponds or rivers, are at constant war, the larger chasing, wounding and destroying the smaller; from the mighty whale, and the voracious shark, to the insignificant muscle—all, by stratagem or open violence, prey upon each other; in some instances, even feeding on those to whom they had but recently.

cently given life. One fish in particular is most remarkable for its cunning and voracity—the loppicus or angler, of the order cartilagine, of which there are eight species. The Europæus, or European angler, is generally found about three feet long, in shape not unlike a tadpole, with a mouth studded with teeth. This fish frequents shallow seas, and having almost covered itself with sand, moves about its tentacula, which other fish mistake for worms, and, in endeavouring to seize them, are caught and devoured by the loppicus. It perhaps will not be idle to conjecture, that from this fish man first took the hint of angling with a baited hook, a practice which seems to be universal; for even in those islands discovered by Captain Cook, and others, the inhabitants, however rude and ignorant, had a method of forming hooks of bone, and attaching them to lines, for the purpose of angling.

" The whale finds a cruel and terrible enemy in the sword-fish, on the approach of whom he becomes dreadfully alarmed, flying through the water to escape, but is eagerly pursued by this comparatively little animal, who inflicts the most severe wounds upon him, and generally succeeds in producing the death of his antagonist.

" The fact is well known that the cod-fish, taken on our coasts, are principally attracted by the whiting, which is their most favourite food: soles, and several other flat-fish, live chiefly on the spawn of other fish; the crab feeds on the smaller-sized sole; and, again, the muscle makes prey of the young unwary crab.

" In fresh waters the case is similar: Jack, pike, salmon, perch, trout, chub, eels, &c. destroy immense numbers of their brethren daily, and, by their tyranny, keep the whole inhabitants of the rivers, lakes, and ponds, in continual terror and alarm. The angler has frequent opportunities of observing the extreme distress and agitation of small fish when a pike, or any other fish of prey, make his appearance among them: on these occasions they are so much terrified and confused as sometimes to leap out of the water into a boat, or on the shore, to escape the fangs of their merciless pursuers, and avoid immediate destruction. Among fish it may be truly said, that might takes place of right, and the weakest go to the wall.

" I have taken several roach, and other fish, that were much disfigured and wounded, particularly on the sides, by their ravenous enemies,* which must have caused them sufferings far more acute than could possibly arise from any method used by the angler, whose hook generally catches the fish by the lip or gill, parts (I conceive) not the most susceptible of pain.

" The pike, fell tyrant of the liquid plain,
With ravenous waste devours his fellow train;
Nor less the greedy trout, and gutless eel,
Incessant woes and dire destruction deal."

* The mouth of a fish of prey, particularly the pike, is studded with teeth in such a manner as to pierce his victim with many hundred darts at once: the large, sharp, crooked fangs in the lower jaws, the frightful expansion of which, with the horrid abyss of throat, must convey to the observer the terror and sufferings of the defenceless part of the finny tribe. It sometimes happens that a jack or pike will gorge such a quantity of fish as to appear, for a considerable time, with a part of the last even yet hanging out of the destroyer's mouth, writhing in agony: so great is their voracity.

Mr. Crumpton's blue d. Romulus, beat Mr. Hoskins's blk. b. Glow-worm.

N. B. Our correspondent remarks, that this last decision was by no means satisfactory to the majority of the company, which was not only numerous, but very respectable, inasmuch as Romulus had ten yards at least the start of Glow-worm, and the hare was killed in little more than 100 yards; and the more so, as in a former course which Glow-worm contested with Moorcock, it was adjudged an undecided course on account of the shortness of it, though it was more than twice the length of the course in question, and in which Glow-worm had the advantage of four turns against two, and killing the hare. But we have great satisfaction in being further informed, that the contending parties, with many other gentlemen, afterwards dined together at the Vernon's Arms, in Sudbury, where they passed a most agreeable evening, and the conviviality was kept up to a late hour; and a further subscription entered into for the next season.

ECCEN-

ECCENTRIC INSCRIPTIONS ON TOMB-STONES.

To the Editor of the Sporting Magazine.

SIR,

THERE is a monument erected in Winchester Cathedral church-yard, to the memory of a Hampshire grenadier militia-man, which may, perhaps, not be thought unworthy of a place in your Magazine. The four first lines were written by a Serjeant of the Company. The two last, after the monument was repaired by the officers of the garrison, were added by Dr. Warton.

In Memory of

THOMAS THATCHER,

Who died of a violent fever, contracted by drinking cold small beer, when extremely hot, after a long march, on the 12th May, 1764.—In grateful remembrance of his universal good-will towards his comrades, this stone is placed here, at their request, as a small testimony of their regard and concern.

Here sleeps in peace, a Hampshire grenadier,
Who died by drinking cold small beer.
Soldiers, be warn'd from his unhappy fall,
And if y'ere hot—drink STRONG, or none at all.

The monument containing the above, being gone to decay, it was replaced by the officers of the garrison in 1781, and the following two lines added:—

An honest soldier never is forgot,
Whether he die by musket, or by pot.

After the above took place, the whole stone was again destroyed, and another is erected, bearing this inscription:—

"In consequence of the original Stone being destroyed, this Stone was replaced by the Officers of the North Hants Regiment, when disembodied the 26th April, 1802."

A DAY'S JOURNEY.

Man's life is short (they say), merely a day's journey—or like a day spent at an inn, as the writer of the following epitaph seemed to think, which is taken from a tombstone in the north of Devon, erected to the memory of an innkeeper, who, during his life, used to quote a parody on Gay's epitaph, viz.:

"Life's an Inn—my house will shew it,
I thought so once, but now I know it."

And when he died, he requested the following epitaph might be inscribed on his own tomb-stone, which it is:—

"Man's life is but a winter's day,
Some only breakfast—and away;
Others to dinner stay, and are full fed:
The oldest man but sups, and then to bed.
Large is his debt, who lingers out the day;
He who goes soonest, has the least to pay.

ON A TOMB-STONE IN BAKEWELL CHURCH-YARD.

"Know, Posterity, that on the 8th of April, 1757, the rambling remains of John Date were, in the 85th year of his pilgrimage, laid on his two wives.

"This thing, in life, might cause some jealousy;
Here all three lie together, lovingly;
But from embraces here, no pleasure flows;
Alike are here, all human joys and woes.
Here Sarah's chidings, John no longer hears,
And old John's ramblings, Sarah no more fears:
A period's come to all their toilsome lives,
The good man's quiet—still are both his wives."

DEVONSHIRE SPORTING.

Communicated by a Correspondent.

THE Chimleigh Fox-hounds have lately had remarkably fine sport, and have been both numerously and respectably attended, not equal, to be sure, to the Leicestershire and Northamptonshire Hunts; but we have lately seen fifty,

fifty, sixty, and sometimes eighty sportsmen in the field, extremely well mounted, and altogether in a good sportsman-like style.

The best harriers in the south-western part of Devonshire, are those of Francis Parker, Esq. at Whiteway, near Exeter; and John Spurrell Pode, Esq. at Slade, near Ivybridge. Both packs are high bred, being a good deal dashed with the fox-hound, which is necessary in this part of the country, for the hares bred on Hall-down, on Hanger-down, Henlick-down, Stall-moor, Pen-moor, Harford-moor, and every other part of Dart-moor, are not like the hares of the low and inclosed countries; on the contrary, from their setting on such high ground, and having so very far to come to their food, they actually resemble foxes in their running, being frequently known to take off and break country in the most gallant style, leading the hounds exactly as if they were after a fox, for one, two, and sometimes (though rarely, to be sure, on account of the hounds being so high bred) even for three hours, directly over the highest part of the moors, without the hounds being at a check for a moment, or puss ever making a double. This would hardly be believed by those who have not seen it, and has often greatly astonished all those who are used only to hare hunting in the low and inclosed countries. Old sportsmen are sometimes staggered and inclined to think that it is a fox, and not a hare, which the hounds are after—so much does it resemble a glorious burst after Reynard.

Both Mr. Parker's and Mr. Pode's hounds have been extremely fortunate during the last season, and have shewn much sport, to the delight of all those who have had the pleasure of partaking of it.

For the reasons before assigned, both these packs are so much dashed with the fox-hound, that they will hunt a fox in as good a style as a hare, and have often done so within the last month, for as the hare-hunting season goes out, they have recourse to fox-hunting upon the moors, where they occasionally find; but foxes, I am sorry to say, are by no means plenty in this part of Devonshire. The west-country farmers invariably declare war against them, and if, by chance, they lose a duck or a goose, the whole posse comitatus are immediately up in arms against the poor devil, and attack him with pistols, guns, blunderbusses, gins, traps, shovels, and pickaxes; also "sticks, stones, and staves," (as the lawyers say), so that Reynard stands but a poor chance of preserving his life, and the consequences are, that they are extremely scarce in this part of the county, which I am sorry for.

WOLVES AND RED DEER IN NEWFOUNDLAND.

ON the coast of Labrador, and in the islands next to that part of the Continent of North America, frequented by a variety of animals, calculated, some for pursuit, others for evasion, the traveller is often the spectator of scenes truly interesting to the sportsman. Here are witnessed, not only the most furious rencounters, but also the most arduous specimens of the chace. Of these, none is more deserving attention than that between the wolves and the red deer, in the island island of Newfoundland. Before, however, we enter on a description of the contest between these animals, it may be necessary to mention a few particulars of them respectively, as unnoticed by naturalists: Of the stag tribe, this is the largest—the best accounts make it much more than four hundred weight; in its aspect it is noble, in its gait stately, and when attired in its long shaggy winter coat, it makes a truly fine appearance, and seems to rank with the hardiest animals of the forest. Of a roving disposition, its stay is short, even in places of ease and plenty. But what most surprises the spectator is, the great and apparently disproportioned length of its pasterns.—The wolf of this part of North America, whether we regard its make, habits, or propensities, differs very materially from that of Europe: in point of size, it is as large again—its deep broad chest, bony legs, and low haunches, bespeak the combination of strength, speed, and agility; the powers of the jaw may be inferred, from its invariably cracking the bones of its victim, even of a young heifer, in order (after being satisfied with the flesh) to come at the marrow. It is gregarious only occasionally, as in the season of love, or as joining in the chase. In its prowling excursions, unless in the act of pursuit, it may be said to creep rather than to walk—its head is in constant motion from one side to the other, and it seldom looks straight forwards. On hearing any unusual noise it erects its ears, the tops of which fall down again, like those of the greyhound. Destined to roam through a dreary desart, covered with snow the greater part of the year, it is singularly qualified to bear the rigours of the climate—its outer coat long, ragged, and rusty, as if singed, issues from a thick warm fur, which covers the whole body, and on its shoulders is a sort of mane, of upright hair, five or six inches long, and nearly as stiff as the bristles of a hog. In the summer, though it now and then meets with a fawn, it seldom partakes of its favourite food. The full-grown male deer has at this season little to fear but from its antlers, the females less. Once got clear of the woods, their long pasterns coming in contact with the surface at every bound, render them superior to their enemies in speed over the spongy and marshy savannas, enable them to reach the extensive lakes which abound in this country, and secure themselves from their pursuers. In the inverted season of the year, however, when all is ice and snow, the ponds, for which they always make when hard pressed, instead of affording refuge, prove their sure destruction. Then is this mighty chace continued in earnest—the herds of deer roving periodically to and from their more remote retreats, are now often met with, and seldom by more than one wolf: the stoutest deer keeping this at bay till the herd is secured, generally becomes himself the object of pursuit; most certainly so if there be any other wolf in that neighbourhood. The well-known yell uttered in quest of game, collects all within hearing together, and the uproar is begun. Away starts the deer, and having got at some distance, and looked back on either side at its pursuers, he flies the country at nearly the height of his speed. Here again his long pasterns, embracing such a space, prevent his sinking in the snow, and he gets leagues a-head of his assailassailants; nor does he slacken his pace till he thinks he has outstripped his enemies, and then only to hearken—he hears nothing but the throbbing of his own heart. Continuing his course a little further, now he gallops slowly, then trots, then walks—with erect head, flashing eyes, and nostrils yet distended, turning round and looking at the quarter whence he came, he stands—he listens—crops and half chews the leafless twig—again he listens—all is silence—his fears gradually discarded, with lowered head and flapping ears, he loiters over the snowy waste, and picking here and there the scanty fir-bud, at length he lays down to rest.—Full many a needless step has insatiate hunger forced his enemies beyond the proper track—still they persevere — the scent recovered, grows warmer—on they press—they jostle each other—they snarl in hope of blood—low in his lair, the deer feels a faint buzzing in his ears—he shakes his head—'tis gone—it comes again—again he shakes his head, and rising up, stretches himself—a sudden gust of wind now wafts into his ears the full peal of his approaching enemies—breathing high, and knitting himself close and compact together, he bounds off lighter than when first attacked—keeping clear of the woods, again he leaves his pursuers far behind him—again come up with, press'd, and kept to his full speed, now galloping high, now reeling, he reaches the fatal pond—on the slippery element his hoofs deny their office—unable to proceed, the thunder close behind him, he struggles—large round drops roll from his eyes; and, bellowing so as to awaken the echo in the adjacent hills, this fine creature falls, and becomes the prey of its relentless assailants.

THE ANGLER'S DAY.

IT was early in September, when an Angler sallied forth to enjoy his favourite sport—a sport, which he considered, and always found, to be well suited to a contemplative mind. Soon after five in the morning, he started. At his back hung his haversack, filled with his tackle, his provision, and his baits. A heavy mist hung over the valleys, which, as the sun rose, was gathered by his power into fleecy clouds, and sailed athwart the blue expanse of heaven, thus giving to the angler's gladdened sight the beauties of nature refreshed by the balmy dews of night. He had a taste for poetry; and his memory, at this moment, fixing itself on Milton's morning hymn, he began ejaculating and continued his way, full of such ideas, till miles had been left behind; every tree, every zephyr, every rivulet, furnishing him with a living comment.

"These are thy glorious works, Parent of good!"

The harvest was every where finished, or very nearly so: the labourers were conveying home the produce of the earth, whistling their matins, as early and as loudly as the lark, who had long soared to "heaven's gate."—Never perhaps had a nation greater cause to rejoice, and offer up thanksgiving for an over-abundant and well-housed harvest, than England had, last season. The Angler turned his thoughts to this. "Here," his fancy whispered, "all has been plenty, peace, and cheerfulness: the morning has risen in beauty; Sol has spread his beams over hills and vales waving with corn, or offering their green verdure to the dumb creatures destined for man's support. Noon has found the labourer, bourer taking his plain but undisturbed meal, under the briary hedge. The Angler now reached the river where his fishing was to commence; and, like a true sportsman, he suffered all other thoughts to be absorbed in his anxiety to ensnare the finny tribe.

"The Angler envies no man's joys,
But his who gains the greatest sport,
With peace he dwells far from the noise,
And bustling grandeur of a court."

The morning was still: not a ripple was upon the water, which flowed silent and deep. He was soon equipped: the depth of the water was carefully ascertained, and other necessary preliminaries settled. Soon he hooks a fine fish: his pliant rod bends and rattles as the poor captive tugs at his hook; he is all trembling anxiety, lest he should lose him. For a moment the fish becomes entangled among the weeds, and fear is evident on the Angler's countenance. Now he is loose again, and he draws him to the surface of the water again. He has caught a fine chub: with difficulty he lands his prize, and for a few moments gazes on it with delight, then throws it on the ground, and again proceeds with his labour, all anxiety as before, his eye constantly bent on his float of porcupine quill. Thus the morning glides away; and the timid chub, the bold perch, the simple gudgeon, the glittering roach and dace, and the unwieldy bream, alternately become his prize, and reward him for his patience. About mid-day, he takes his hasty and solitary meal beneath some tree; and, after it, slakes his thirst with water from the river; thus emulating the abstemiousness of the primeval race of men. He then re-commences his sport, and cannot tear himself from the side of the stream, till day's last beam trembles in the west. He then packs up his fish, and re-traces his weary way homeward, envying, as old Isaac Walton used to say, no man for his riches or his power, but only him who had better tackle, or who could catch more fish than himself. Such was the angler's day.—Blame him not, ye who have no relish for such amusement as his: call him not cruel, ye too sensitive beings,

"And ye, who proudly boast
Of feelings delicate, and most refin'd,
Ye male or female sensibilitists,
Who shrink and shudder at the angler's sport,
Yet from your doors unpitied, unreliev'd,
Turn the poor vet'ran, whose best blood has stream'd
For your security so ill deserv'd,
Blush and be silent:———"

The exercise, to which his amusement leads him, gives health to his body; and the charms of nature, with which he is thus rendered familiar, are living lessons of improvement for his mind. He leaves the crowded town, and its thoughts of guile, behind, when he seeks the little hamlet, or the lonely cottage by the river side; and, as he goes to, or returns from, his sport, his contemplation on the rural scenery he passes, leads him to adore the Being who made him,

"And look, through Nature, up to Nature's God!"

BACCHANALIAN ANECDOTE.

To the Editor of the Sporting Magazine.

SIR,

I Beg leave to add to your valuable collection of good things, by presenting you with a most valuable luable receipt by which any man may lengthen his days.—I am, Sir, your's, &c.

METHUSALEM.

A BACCHANALIAN ANECDOTE; OR, HOW TO LENGTHEN A MAN'S DAYS.

A young bon vivant, of some celebrity in the fashionable world, had suffered considerably in constitution from his sacrificing rather too much at the shrine of that jolly god who presides over, and is said to delight in, "potent libations."—This young hero's mother, alarmed at his declining state of health, and finding that her kind and maternal admonitions failed to produce the desired effect of abstinence on the part of her son, employed the family physician to give him a lecture on temperance, and the very dangerous consequences of continual inebriety. Now it so happened that this same family doctor* was one of the old school, with a big wig, (the "wisdom's in the wig," Mr. Editor) and a gold-headed cane (à la Dr. Lenitive). After the old gentleman had expostulated for a long time, in a pompous dogmatical style, on the necessity and blessings of a due observance of temperance, as well as on the inevitable consequences of his indulging himself in such potent and daily libations of wine, he clearly demonstrated to him, as a fixed point and principle, "that if he persisted in so doing, he would spur on the wheels of life too fast, and thereby arrive at a premature end of his journey." "In short," said he, coming to his grand climax, "if you wish to lengthen your days, you must submit to a regimen, and positively not drink more than a pint of wine per diem."

This lecture having been very seriously and very forcibly delivered,

* This worthy and scientific gentleman was the celebrated Dr. Biblibus, since deceased, but his memory will be immortalized by his classical "Dissertation on the dire effects of Drunkenness—or Ebriety—or Inebriety." For, as the learned Doctor observes, with a view, no doubt, to the better information of the uninformed, ebriety and *in*ebriety, according to Sheridan's Dictionary, are synonimous terms—that is to say, one and the same thing. Now how this can be, Mr. Editor, unless you make a bull of it, we must leave to Sheridan's Irish Dictionary, and the learned Doctor's profound Dissertations, to elucidate. However, it strikes me, Mr. Editor, that if ebriety mean drunkenness, then for a man to be in a state of *in*ebriety must mean, according to the bon vivant's phraseology, that he is "in for it." And this I take to be the true definition of the thing, but if there are any sceptics or unbelievers on this doctrine of mine, I must beg leave to refer them to page 1286 of the 139th folio volume of the Doctor's celebrated Dissertations before alluded to, wherein he most clearly exemplifies the various gradations of drunkenness; as thus, he begins by observing, that a drunken man is "Homo duplicans," or a double man, because (says the doctor) he sees things double, and is not as he should be, "profecto ipse he,"—but livered, the young Bacchanalian was rather alarmed by it, and promised the Doctor he would endeavour to follow his advice as closely as possible.

A short time after the old gentleman called upon him again, and with very great professional pomp and anxiety, enquired if he followed his regimen of restriction, with regard to drinking only a pint of wine a day, adding, "that he was more than ever convinced it was the only means by which he could prolong his life."

"Doctor," said the young buck, "pray give yourself no further trouble to enforce the truth of your observations with regard to prolonging my life, or lengthening my days, (as you call it) for yesterday I scrupulously followed your advice, by taking only one solitary pint of wine after dinner, and by heavens it was, beyond all doubt, the longest day I ever experienced in my life."

REMARKABLE FOX CHASE.

To the Editor of the Sporting Magazine.

SIR,

SHOULD you think the subjoined anecdote (for the truth of which I can vouch) worthy of insertion in your Magazine, you will confer an obligation on

AN OLD SPORTSMAN.

About eleven o'clock on Monday, the 13th of February, the Mellerstain hounds found a fox at

---

but as he should not be, "defecto ipse he." And then he goes on to explain the various appellations which are given to that destructive vice; as for example, one class of society will describe a drunken man as being

"Non se ipse,
"Non compos mentis;
or, "Elevated,
or, "Electrified."

Another class will say, he's

"Terribly cut;
or, "In the suds."

A Jack Tar will say,

"He's out of his latitude,
"Across the line,
"Damaged in his upper works,
"Beside his reckoning;
or, "Half seas over."

Others (not quite so elegant, perhaps) will say,

"He has bung'd his eye,
"Is knocked up,
"How come ye so,
"Has got his little hat on,
"Is top heavy,
"Pot valiant,
"Has been in the sun?
or "Is much disguised."

Some will say that he's

"Snuffy,
"Bosky,
"Tipsy,
"Dizzy,
"Muzzy,
"Sucky,
"Rocky,
"Muddled,
"Fuddled."
or, "That he clips the King's English;
"Is as blind as Chloe,
"Quite happy,"
And "All mops and brooms."

I really beg your pardon, Mr. Editor, for this very long and I fear tedious digression. But, Sir, if a man wish to acquire celebrity by his writing, now a days, you must be perfectly aware, as well as myself, that it is indispensably necessary for his notes and annotations to be full as long, if not longer, than the original matter.

 Minto

Minto Crags, the seat of Lord Minto, in Roxburghshire, and after a very sharp run of about seven miles, finding himself hard pressed, he entered a gentleman's house hard by, and made his way up stairs into a bed room, where, being unobserved, he lay concealed for some time. In the mean while, a fresh fox was unkenneled, from a plantation close to the house in which reynard had taken refuge, and went off in good style towards the Selkirkshire hills, but being headed back, he made for Minto Crags, where he got to ground. This was supposed to be the fox the hounds had gone away with in the morning from Minto; but it created no small surprise next morning to receive reynard secured in a sack, in which he was conveyed from his place of refuge, and on the following Wednesday he was turned out, and after a most excellent run towards Mellerstain Woods, he was killed in his attempt to cross the Tweed. Thus died reynard, and a gamer one was never before a pack.

DOGS IN NEWFOUNDLAND.

A Private letter from St. John's, Newfoundland, recently received, communicates the following interesting particulars of these animals.

[Extract from a Private Letter.]

" IN THE COURT OF SESSIONS, FEBRUARY 3, 1815.

" St. John's, &c. to wit,

" The Grand Jurors having presented to the Court, that the hydrophobia now actually exists amongst the dogs of this town, and is become truly dangerous to the inhabitants.

" It is ordered, that all dogs whatsoever, found at large in or about the town of St. John's, be forthwith destroyed, except such dogs as are employed in sleds, being securely muzzled.

" That in order the more effectually to promote the destroying such dogs, a reward of five shillings, for such dog so destroyed, shall be paid, upon its being produced in the Court House-yard.

" By Order of the Sessions,

" LIONEL CHAUNCEY,
Clerk of the Peace."

A proclamation to the same effect will be issued from the Supreme Court to-morrow, and there is a similar presentment from the District Grand Jury. It is certainly alarming, and if the fact is so, it is the first instance of canine madness known in this country, or, I believe, in any of the British North American Colonies. The dogs at large here, at the lowest calculation, amount to at least two thousand, which are left all the summer, when their owners go to the fishery, to provide themselves, and are not only great trouble to the inhabitants, but also public nuisances, from starvation and disease, in the streets. They go in packs, destroy sheep, poultry, and every thing they can meet with: but when winter comes on, they become not only really useful but absolutely requisite—they are most carefully sought for and claimed by their owners, and are the subject of many suits in the Courts, their value being from forty shillings to eight pounds, the medium about four guineas. They draw, when it is cut, wood for fuel, fish, flukes, shores, &c. &c. to the amount of many hundred pounds worth a day; and it is confidently said, that for this last month they have

have furnished the town with from nine hundred to a thousand pounds a day, and one dog supports, by his labour, his master for the winter—drawing merchandises of all sorts, from one end of the town to the other. It is allowed, should the fact be as it has been represented, that the madness has been brought here by an English bull-dog last summer, which bit many dogs in that populous part of the town, called Maggoty Cove, when unfortunately he was killed before his real state had been fully ascertained. Many persons have been bitten three and four months since, but no symptoms of madness have yet appeared. I have been told by a well-informed medical man, that he has been in this country these seventeen years, and has seen almost every season symptoms nearly resembling the present, with almost every appearance of madness; has had several patients who have been bitten, one in particular about thirteen years since, who was bitten in his presence by a dog, he was himself convinced at the time was absolutely mad; that he treated the man as for a common bite, from the concurrent testimony of all the inhabitants, that no such thing existed; he has ever since been perfectly well, and has had several such cases since under his care, in which he has been equally successful; nor did he ever know, either in the human or the brute creation, any contagion so communicated; but he does not deny the possibility of its being imported, as I have mentioned. He says, it is a fever among the dogs, with all the semblance of rabies, increased by severe work, and salt food (for they feed upon damaged and putrid salt fish), aggravated by not having a sufficiency of water, the streams being frozen up, and the snow they eat not being capable of doing more than moistening their mouths; nor would their cruel task-masters allow them time, if even water was plenty, to drink, though they would enjoy it themselves. It is certainly fortunate there is such a disorder, as unless there was something of the kind to carry off the dogs, we should be over-run with them.

ARABIAN HORSES, AT MR. HALL'S STABLES.

To the Editor of the Sporting Magazine.

SIR,

A Few days since, I received a letter from R. Honner, Esq. a gentleman intirely a stranger to me, who has, within these few years, visited India, and who desired that I would look at two Arabians, which he brought over with him from the East. They stand at Hall's stables, near Tattersall's Repository, and as it is the peculiar province of the Sporting Magazine, I feel no difficulty in requesting a place for an account of these horses, that they may, through your means, be fairly introduced to the notice of the breeders of the turf.

Mr. Honner informs me, that he arrived from India in 1807, whither he returned in the following year. In the interim, my Treatise on Horses falling into his hands, he received an impression from some remarks on Arabian horses, which he found in the Chapter on Running Horses and the Turf—to the effect that, very few horses brought over hither from the East, under under the general name of Arabians, were really such, but a mixed breed from the circumjacent countries. Hence the general uselessness for the racing stud, of this description of horses, and the disrepute into which Arabians have long fallen. Mr. H. in consequence, took the resolution to use his utmost endeavours, on his arrival in India, to procure a horse immediately from Arabia, on the genuineness of the blood of which, under that circumstance, he conceived there could be no question. A horse procured from the centre of Arabia Deserta, with an attested pedigree of his blood, he reasoned, must at any rate, be a thorough-bred Arab, and such was his aim.

Arrived at Bombay, he commissioned several Captains of vessels bound up the Persian Gulph, to purchase for him a horse from the Arabian coast, but not one, for two or three years, touched at any part of that coast. At length one of them being short of water, touched at Bushire on the Persian side of the Gulph, and there found, in the possession of Mr. Bruce, our India Company's resident, a colt, for which Mr. Bruce had expressly sent his own durbash, or steward, to the opposite coast of Arabia. This colt had been brought from a great distance in the country, and was in extremely low and bad condition, when the Captain purchased it, having apparently undergone great fatigue from travel. According to the certificate of its blood, received from Mr. Bruce and since translated, it was foaled at a town in Arabia, called Lassah, in February, the year of the Hegirah 1223, which I believe answers to 1808 of the Christian era. The colt being taken on board, was washed all over daily, with sea water, and, with a considerable degree of care from the Captain, arrived in a somewhat improved state at Bombay; it was, nevertheless, obliged to be left there two years, before it was perfectly recovered. It is a dark blood bay.

The other, a grey horse, was sent from the desert, by the great Wahabee Sheik, a present to the Imaun of Muscat. From the Imaun, he passed into the hands of Captain Seaton, the Company's resident at his court. Mr. Honner afterwards wished to purchase this horse at Bombay, but was asked thirty thousand rupees for him, or upwards of three thousand pounds sterling, to which he would not, in course, listen. Having arrived at home in 1811, a ship came in with the horse on board, consigned to the brother and agent of Mr. Ricards of Bombay, for whom Captain Seaton had originally purchased him. The poor animal had been three weeks in sling, on ship board, and was so miserably cut, bruised, and out of condition, that Mr. Ricards refused to take charge of him, it being the general opinion that he could not recover. Under these circumstances of extreme risk, Mr. Honner purchased the grey Wahabee Arabian, and had the good fortune completely to restore him to health. He has since covered three seasons in Ireland, but not being publicly known, or in sporting hands, has had none but half-bred mares, with the exception of one of his proprietor, Rattle, by Trumpator, formerly the property of his Grace the Duke of Grafton. The produce of this cover, a colt rising three years old, is to be seen with the horses at Hall's stables.

Such is the detail respecting the mode of obtaining these Arabs, which which has been put into my hands by Mr. Honner, accompanied with well-known names as his vouchers. And it is at his express desire that I state his probably exclusive pretensions at the present time, to having imported horses immediately from the desert of Arabia, it being a generally known fact, as above stated, that with a very few and high formed exceptions, the generality of the horses brought over hither from the East, under the name of Arabians, have been merely South-eastern horses, the mixed breed of various regions; probably, indeed, having the ground or basis of Arabian blood, and generally known in the East by the name of Bussorah Arabs—and, subject to the opinion of gentlemen of the turf, on inspection of these horses, it is submitted whether they are not fairly intitled to the encouragement of a trial from all our turf breeders, who are well aware of the importance of real Arabian blood, and the wonders it has worked in producing the transcendant stock of this country, unparallelled upon any other part of the habitable globe. Nor need I advert to the consideration which is due to a gentleman, who has engaged his time and property with so much zeal in the cause of the turf, after precisely that mode, at once the most difficult, and of the greatest acknowledged importance towards success.

The universal objection among our turf breeders, to breeding from Arabs, or indeed any foreign horses, is, beyond all question, grounded on experience. On my recommending these Arabs to the notice of a distinguished member of the Jockey Club, and successful breeder, he remarked, that he was too old to breed from Arabians, since their immediate produce now, never raced. But are we then never more to draw for a twenty thousand in this lottery? Are we never again to try for a true-bred mountain or desert horse, Arab or Barb—or to give encouragement to adventurers in that interesting pursuit? I could probably assign some reasons why, the time has been for some years expired, when such a plan had already become eligible. The reason lies upon the surface, why the mixed breed, or Bussorah Arabs, will not race in their immediate descendants. Want of blood. We might with equal prospect of success, breed from our own three-part bred stock, and wait the course of blood through the requisite number of generations. How gloriously different the case is, with the true-bred courser of the desert, let the reader be reminded in the two following illustrious examples, which our universe, neither ancient nor modern, can parallel!

THE DARLEY ARABIAN—his immediate produce—The Devonshire or Flying Childers—Bleeding Childers—Almanzor—Whitelegs—Cupid—Brisk—Bullyrock—Whistlejacket—Dœdalus—Skipjack—Manica—Aleppo—Dart—Whimsey—although this Arabian was little other than a private stallion in Mr. Darley's stud.

THE GODOLPHIN ARABIAN—his immediate produce——Lath—Cade—Dismal—Regulus—Blank—Old England—Skewball—Babram—Whitenose—Posthumus—Tamerlane—Dormouse—The Godolphin Gelding—Godolphin Colt—Entrance—Godolphin Hunter—Myrza—and many others, this Arabian having nearly all the best bred mares of the country.

Such splendid lists surely ought to to excite ambition and emulation in bosoms devoted to the enticing and profitable pursuits of the course. It may be expected that I should venture an opinion upon the Arabs which are the subjects of this paper, having attentively inspected them; since I have perhaps, in my Treatise on Horses, and in my late History of the Race Horse, hazarded more speculations on the subject, than any other person; and since I have reflected upon it, as occasion and observation have served, during the greater part of my life, having had moreover, some small practice on horseback upon the course; but I beg to leave that point to superior judges, and to those at present, more in training than myself. I can, nevertheless, state a few facts, as they yesterday occurred to my observation. The grey horse is of considerable size and great bone, indeed of sufficient to get coach cattle and strong hunters. His muzzle is fine, his shoulder and quarters of great extent, and the substance by no means disadvantageously placed. The colt by this horse, which will probably rise to full fifteen hands and half, I think, shews some running about him, and deserves a trial. He is full of bone. The brown Arabian is about fourteen hands one half high, and of great ability to carry weight. He has the fine muzzle and deerlike hoofs of the wild horse, and a gentleman present would conceit him much to resemble the portrait of the Godolphin Arabian, which we had just viewed. Indeed he is a little horse of peculiar figure. Mr. Honner made the experiment of training him in Ireland, and found that he could outfoot certain of the best goers there. He gives me an admirable description of Irish training, of which, indeed, I wish this country could afford fewer specimens. His horse wont recover the elevation of his crest in haste, the better to become successor in appearance to the Godolphin Arabian. Half a dozen or half a score suits of cloths and hoods, blankets, and the lord knows what, and long sweats, one on the back of another, with rattling gallops between, were knowingly and according to good custom bestowed upon this horse, in order to lay bare his ribs and shoulder blades, as speedily as might be, for the benefit of anatomical inspection at the starting post, and to give him as little weight as possible of his own to carry, since so little strength was allowed to enable him to carry it. But wind and lightness are all in all—such was the wisdom of past ages, and many yet, both in England and Ireland, suppose it the sin against the Holy Ghost to be wiser than their forefathers. Whether, however, this horse really beat any racer against his will, in Ireland, or not, is a matter of trifling concern to him as a stallion, since we do not look for actual running in an Arabian; blood only.

I remain, Sir, with real truth and heartiness, your old friend and correspondent,

JOHN LAWRENCE.

Somers Town, March 17.

Sunday, March 19.—P. S. The two stallions being occasionally ridden, I had this morning an opportunity of seeing them take a canter in Hyde Park. It by no means lowered them in my estimation. Beyond a doubt, they gallop in the style of true runners. They have both a great stride, and their haunches follow well. The Wa-habee

babee Arabian is a grand horse mounted, and attracted general notice. He put me in mind, in respect of figure, of some old portrait which I have seen, of the famous Byerley Turk. Although very playful, they are the best-natured and kindest of animals, and to appearance, good horses to ride.

BATTLE BETWEEN MOLINEUX AND COOPER.

Edinburgh, March 11.

YESTERDAY, the long talked of battle for one hundred guineas, took place between Cooper and Molineux, at Corset-hill, in Lanarkshire. At half-past twelve o'clock the combatants appeared in the ring, Cooper seconded by Oliver and Richmond, Molineux by Joe Ward and a Yorkshire pugilist. In about a quarter of an hour the set-to commenced—Betting 6 to 4 on the Black.

1st Round.—Both cautious. The Black made play, right and left. Cooper planted a body hit, but slipped, and was knocked under the ropes.

2d.—Good fighting. The Black hit Cooper on the head, but Cooper put in two terrific blows with the right hand on the left kidnies. Both fell.

2d.—Here the Black began to shew his style, which was, to watch his man and hit counters at his head, Cooper as yet fighting at the body. Many blows exchanged. The Black was rallied up against the ropes, and drew first blood; but was hit out betwixt the ropes.

4th.—Black exhausted. Cooper gay—went in, and floored his man.

5th.—Cooper went up to his man, gave him three facers, and hit him down.—A guinea to a shilling on Cooper.

6th.—Cooper quite confident—Black weak, and floored by a facer.

7th, 8th, and 9th.—Cooper had decidedly the advantage, and floored his man in each round.

10th.—Cooper made play; but the Black rallied; and got him up against the ropes. Cooper doubled him up, and, springing out of his way, the Black fell with his head against one of the ring posts.

11th.—In this round the Black lessened the odds. Cooper went at his man; much good fighting. Cooper was rallied up to the ropes, but closed with the Black, and fibbed him; then getting disengaged, the Black floored Cooper by a tremendous facer. The Black fell from weakness.

12th. — Cooper, undismayed, went in without ceremony, gave him three sharp facers, and knocked him clean off his legs.

13th and 14th. — The Black could hardly come to time. Cooper, without trouble, knocked him down, and at the end of the 14th round, having fought twenty minutes, Molineux declared he had enough.

REMARKS.— Upon stripping, it was evident to the knowing ones, that Cooper had made good use of his time when training, and that the Black had not.—The Black trusted to his length and overweight; but Cooper's right hand blows were irresistible.—Cooper is between twelve and thirteen stone. He was beat by Oliver, the Westminster champion, at Moulsey, about two years ago; but he displayed such powers in the combat with Jay, at Shepperton, last year, that the ring was astonished, and his his fame was stamped as the most scientific bruiser, and the best hitter of the day.—By nine o'clock in the morning not a horse or carriage of any description was to be procured in the city, and thousands walked to the ground. The number of persons of every description round the ring was prodigious.

AN ENQUIRER.

THE BACHELOR'S TAX.

SIR,

THE Minister having given the contents of his budget for our digestion, allow me to enter my protest against a tax that falls peculiarly heavy on a very respectable body of his Majesty's most loyal subjects, called old Bachelors. That the tax in question is oppressive, as a legislative act, my history will sufficiently prove; for with every disposition to connubial happiness, I have hitherto completely failed in my attempts; and I doubt not that numbers, besides myself, stand in the same predicament.—To begin with my history: you must know that I first addressed myself to a most prudent young lady, with whom I interchanged vows of eternal constancy; and was near being made the happiest of men, when an uncle died, from whom I had great expectations, leaving me only a small legacy. This circumstance, and the advances of a rich fox-hunting squire, wrought so much to my disadvantage, that I was dismissed by her friends, and at their suggestion, she very dutifully yielded to the son of the chase.—Time, that best soother of human woe, soon performs a cure; and I next figured away with a lady in the fashionable world. Like the owl, I sunk down to repose at the approach of the sun, and arose at his departure. Every thing seemed to be in a most favourable train, when imprudently settling some future plans of domestic economy, I was dismissed with the epithet of a mean, avaricious wretch.—My next adventure was with a young lady, who, with a moderate fortune, and a handsome person, had secured to herself, at least, a score of humble admirers, when I fortunately stepped in, and she very condescendingly reduced the number to half a dozen, besides myself. I believe I should have carried the prize, had not a tall man of blood, yclept captain, have come in between; and on my excusing myself from standing to be honourably shot through the head, he very civilly took me by the—nose:—this so enraged me, although one of the mildest of men, that I cudgelled him, both to his and to my own perfect satisfaction. For this affront on a gentleman, and a man of honour, I was dismissed as a low bred, unfashionable fellow, greatly deficient in the ton.—Not yet intimidated, I next waited upon a demure looking creature, who lamented the depravity of the age from morning to night. Here I am suited, thought I, no fear of red coats;—when, as I was one night going to hear her rail against the forwardness of the little

little misses in their teens, I entered upon her too suddenly, and found her demonstrating the attraction and adhesion of ladies, to her footman.—I next became enamoured of the accomplished daughter of a rich old farmer; who, feeling his own great deficiency in all human learning, was resolved to make his daughter a prodigy. She could read a page of Walter Scott without lisping more than a dozen mistakes; she could recite a passage in a play with all the grace of the amateur of fashion; she could thump a sonata on the piano with most discordant fascination; and she could draw, without any fear of punishment from the breach of the second commandment. These rare accomplishments won my heart; when anticipating my union with the accomplished phenomenon, she cruelly deserted me for the irresistible attractions of a strolling player.—Dissatisfied with poems and plays, pianos and paint, I next bowed down to a learned lady, who could harangue in Latin with all the eloquence of a college professor; who could spout Greek with parsonic purity; who could write a criticism on a plain passage in a Greek or Latin author, until it became unintelligible; who could unriddle all the dark meanings of Aristotle; and who could prove, to a demonstration, that the ancients were sages, and the moderns, blockheads.—Well versed in the philosophy of the schools, both ancient and modern; insensible to externals, even to stoicism; for so far had she carried her apathy, that she had actually written a treatise against the passions, and was one night reading to me the chapter against anger, when the maid servant coming in to prepare supper, unfortunately overturned the inkstand upon some critical notes on a Greek author, and thus spoiled the labours of a whole fortnight. This was too much for the mild follower of Zeno.—The inkstand was expelled at the head of the terrified Abigail, with philosophic rage; and on my innocently requesting her to conclude the chapter on anger, she gave a practical illustration of her system by furiously dispatching the treatise full in my face. Perfectly satisfied with lady philosophers, I next offered myself to a devotee; trusting that christianity would teach a milder behaviour. Here I was dragged to the conventicle, every Lord's-day, three times at least; besides attending conferences, night meetings, &c. on the week day; and if I had not indulged a little mistimed scepticism, I might have been united to the most devout lady in Christendom; but happening to doubt of Serpent-logicians, and Ass-orators, I was dismissed as an infidel whom, for the glory of God, it would be well to roast into the faith.—So anxious was I to become a Benedict, that I next became the humble suppliant of my own housemaid; a tall, stout, mahogany faced damsel, whom I believe I should have taken for better or for worse; but indiscreetly offending her on the much dreaded washing day, the enraged Amazon, with ponderous fist, so obscured my perception, that I was ever after blind to her qualifications.—Having had sufficient experience of the moderns, as a last resource, I poured forth my passion to a rich old spinster, whom I was near leading to the altar, when the grim tyrant death intruded, and snatched her away from the enamoured swain.

swain. I could willingly have engaged with some other antique, but with the mournful event before me, of the instability of life in the aged, I was fearful of too soon being left in a widowed state. Grown grey in a life of fruitless importunity, I had reconciled myself to my fate, with philosophical fortitude, when lo! the Minister opened his budget, and thus prevented me an indulgence so necessary to my declining years.—If I be thought to have failed in proving the oppression of the tax, by my history, I shall appeal to scripture, trusting that every good christian will coincide with my arguments. To search for names who have added a lustre to that of Bachelor, would be an endless task: suffice it to say, that Jesus Christ and his disciples were Bachelors; and if they were intended as examples for our imitation, surely we ought to hesitate on so important a point. That great apostle of the gentiles, St. Paul, not only discountenanced matrimony by his practice, but expressly recommended a life of celibacy, as a virtue; and with such authority, all parliamentary arguments vanish like smoke. That the ladies should not coincide with the wholesome advice-giving, and woman-silencing apostle, is no ways extraordinary; but that Mr. Vansittart, the zealous supporter of the Bible Society, should, by the tax in question, set aside the authority of St. Paul, is truly surprising. Notwithstanding the seeming proofs of his piety, unless he withdraw this most unchristian tax, we shall be led to judge, that he has allowed his gallantry to get the better of his christianity.—Your's, &c.

THE JUDGES AND THE PARISH CLERK.

To the Editor of the Sporting Magazine.

SIR,

I Am not certain whether the following circumstance has ever been made public, but I believe it has not; at all events, you know me well enough, as an old correspondent, to be sure that I would not send you any thing as original if I knew it was not so; the facts here related may be relied on, as I have them from undoubted authority.

Some years since, as the late Lord Kenyon and Mr. Justice Rooke, were on the circuit together, it became necessary, from having finished late on a Saturday at one town, and being obliged to be at the next early on Monday morning, to travel on the Sunday. Being both religious men, this was rather a matter of repugnance to them; and they determined not to travel in service time. Arriving at an obscure village, where they had to change horses, just as the bells were going for service, they signified their intention of going to church; this soon spread through the village, and of course a large congregation were assembled, and the best bibs and tuckers were not forgotten on such a memorable occasion. Among the rest, it came to the Parish Clerk's ears, just before he went into church, and wishing not to be behind hand with his neighbours in proper respect, he determined upon finding out some psalm to sing just before the sermon, that should be a little in point. In pursuance of this idea, he spent nearly all the time during the prayers in searching for something to to his purpose; and was so absorbed in it, as very nearly to misplace his responses and amens several times. At length he found, what he so much wished for, and with more than usual fervor gave out to be sung "the four first verses of the 58th psalm." The organ played a symphony, the congregation opened their prayer-books very piously, and began,

"Speak, O ye Judges of the earth,
If just your sentence be;
Or must not innocence appeal
To heav'n, from your decree.

"Your wicked hearts and judgments are Alike by malice sway'd;
Your griping hands, by weighty bribes,
To violence betray'd.

"To virtue strangers from the womb,
Their infant steps went wrong:
They prattled slander, and in lies
Employ'd their lisping tongue.

"No serpent of parch'd Afric's breed,
Does ranker poison bear;
The drowsy adder will as soon
Unlock his sullen ear."

Never, perhaps, did a congregation feel in a more aukward dilemma; the first line was all very well, but after that the clerk lost his usual adherents in singing one by one, their voices died away in an indistinct hum, till he had nobody to support him but a few children whom he had taught to chaunt, and who, with him, went through the obnoxious psalm, or rather the portion which he had given out, for it is as bitter to the very end of it. The people looked askaunt at one another, some even could not help smiling, which many more would have done, had they not inflicted divers bites upon their refractory lips. Even the Judges, patient as they mostly are, could not be supposed to sit this out with much patience. As soon as service was ended, they sent for the churchwarden to know if the insult was an intentional one. He, poor man, knew nothing of the matter, and fearing he might be committed for contempt, sent with all speed for the clerk to explain it. Mr. Amen, who, it turned out, was a most ignorant fellow, soon set the matter, if not to rights, at least in its right light; he had intended to compliment the Judges, and in pursuance of that intention, searched the index to the psalms, where finding the first line of the 58th to be

"Speak, oh ye Judges of the earth,"

He made no doubt it would do, and gave it out accordingly—the consequences have been seen—the Judges went their way—and I remain, your very obedient,

J. M. LACEY.

CHANGES OF THE TIMES.

To the Editor of the Sporting Magazine.

SIR,

ALLOW me to remark in your pages on the curious change which has taken place of late with those useful tradesmen, tailors and innkeepers, in the mode of charging their customers. Formerly the gallant knights of the shears on sending in your account for a coat, made out a lengthy list of items in this way,

To making coat ....so much.
Pocket and sleeve linings......so much.
Silk and mohair ....so much.
Buckram, canvas, tape, and thread ....so much.

With many more, &c. &c. &c.

Now, however, their mode of charging is,

A coat complete...............5 5 0

The Tavern-keeper, on the other hand, lamenting, perhaps, this brief way of settling the reckoning, if he gives you a mutton chop for your dinner, brings in a bill as long as his kitchen spit—to wit,

THE STANDARD.

IN the British Institution is a painting of the Standard, by Cooper, and lest we should be suspected of too much partiality for this artist, on account of the many engravings from his performances in our Magazine, we give the following from the EXAMINER Sunday Paper.

117. " The Standard, unfurls the rapidly encreased talents of Mr. COOPER, and we flock to it with admiring acknowledgments of his legitimate and uncommon powers. It is a work of vigour in every sense of the word, and is one of those few works which leaves little for us to wish for in its display. Resolution to conquer or fall in the fierce contest for the Standard; the fury of maddening assailants raising their brawny arms with deadly power; the fallen and conquered soldier still clasping his broken sword, but exhibiting his unconquerable soul in its revengeful and eager look upward at the combatants; the sympathising impetuosity of the eye-ball glaring horses: the decisive marking of all the parts; the sparkling of the colour and lights corresponding with the briskness of the subject: the thinking, the bustle, the life, the terrible energy of the group, in contrast with the lassitude of a wounded warrior; nearly all the requisites, in fine, of the horrid contest, strike on our imaginations with awful emphasis. This Artist is fast pressing up to the merit of the Dutch painters. A few steps more in precision of drawing and local colour, and he will overtake them."

MALTON COURSING MEETING.

THIS Meeting, under very favourable weather, commenced on Monday, the 27th of February last. Sir M. M. Sykes's foxhounds, on that day, threw off at the village of Westow. In the evening, amongst the Members then assembled, the greyhounds named for the Cup were drawn: and on the Tuesday morning were run, and came in as under:

SPORTING WAGER.

A Law Case tried in the Court of Common Pleas, Feb. 25.

Bland v. Collins.

THIS was an action brought by the plaintiff to recover eighty guineas, claimed by him as having been won from the defendant, under the following circumstances: —The parties were at the last Newmarket Meeting, and after a morning's amusement on the turf, were, with their friends, at the Greyhound Inn, enjoying the pleasures of the bottle.—In the course of the evening the defendant said, he had, during the day, held a conversation with Lord Kingston, upon the subject of purchasing cavalry cast horses, and that his Lordship had told him it was a very unprofitable speculation, and that he would have no more to do with it. The plaintiff, upon hearing this statement, said he was sure Lord Kingston would not have held a conversation with him, and denied the truth of his tale. The defendant repeated that he was not mistaken, for he positively held the conversation which he had detailed, and offered to make any bet upon the subject. The plaintiff immediately took a 10l. note from his pocket, and, placing it upon the table, asked the defendant what he would cover it with? The defendant said, he would bet him eighty guineas to 10l. that what he had stated was correct. The plaintiff, however, perceiving that he was a little "flushed with the Tuscan grape," would not then bet. On the ensuing morning, however, he went into the coffee-room, where the defendant was, and, addressing him in a jocular way, said, "Why, Ned, you were quite valiant last night in offering a bet of eighty guineas to ten, that you had been conversing with Lord Kingston." The defendant immediately repeated his assertion, and said he was ready then to make the same bet. The plaintiff put his note again on the table, and the defendant, without hesitation, covered it with eighty guineas in gold. The bet was then committed to paper, and mutually signed, and the money was placed in the hands of an umpire to abide the event. As soon as this was completed, the plaintiff said, "You are caught, Ned, for the person with whom you conversed was Lord Kensington, and not Lord Kingston. I have made inquiries, and ascertained this to be the fact." The company now laughed, and declared that it was no bet. The plaintiff, however, was not to be done. He said it was a fair wager, and he should insist upon being paid. The defendant then admitted he had been too hasty, and proposed first to give a dinner to the party present, as a punishment for his folly; and this not being agreed to, he proposed adding twenty-five guineas to the plaintiff. The plaintiff, however, insisted upon having the whole sum, and would listen to no compromise whatever. The defendant then desired the umpire not to part with the stakes; and hence the present action was brought.

These facts having been proved, Sir Vicary Gibbs addressed the Jury. He lamented that such bets could be made the subject of actions tions at law; but, as they were permitted, they must be settled according to law. Here the defendant, in the pertinancy of his own opinion, had thought proper to make a foolish wager. There was no fraud on the part of the plaintiff, because the opportunity of ascertaining the truth of the facts alleged was alike afforded to both; and if the defendant had not thought proper to benefit by that opportunity, he must take the consequence.

Verdict for the plaintiff—damages eighty guineas, costs forty shillings.

ENQUIRY AFTER OLD RACERS.

To the Editor of the Sporting Magazine.

SIR,

BEING in company lately with some gentlemen of the turf, among whom the perusal of your Magazine had excited a curiosity respecting the racers of former days; among others, a recollection arose of Mr. Swinfen's famous colt, by Chrysolite, out of the dam of Shark, which in 1777, won the great stakes at Nottingham, forty-two subscribers, fifteen of whom started, beating Potatoes, Fleacatcher, Tremamondo, and others, the best four-year-olds of that year. This colt also walked over for another sweepstakes at Litchfield, and soon afterwards died, to Mr. Swinfen's very heavy loss and disappointment, in all probability being the best horse of that time in England. Some remarks being made respecting this colt's death, which attracted my curiosity, I should be glad if any of your senior correspondents, who may have had information on the cause and manner of it, would communicate the particulars, as they might possibly lead to instruction.

It is a fact well-known to all trotting jockies, that thorough-bred racers cannot trot with sufficient speed, to race in that pace. Their form of going is generally opposite to the quick, short, or contracted action of the racing trotter, nor will their feet or tendons endure the severe shocks and concussion of the hard road.—Hence no thorough-bred horse, mare, or gelding, was ever known capable of trotting sixteen miles in one hour, and ONE only stands on record, or within knowledge, as having trotted fifteen miles in one hour; that one was Infidel, by Turk, which performed that task in the north, carrying, I believe, nine or ten stone. An account of the date and particulars of that trotting match, would be acceptable. Several race horses have been supposed capable of trotting fourteen miles in one hour, and it was reported that the late Lord Grosvenor once offered to match Mambrino to do it, for a thousand guineas.—I am, Sir, &c. &c.

FEROCITY OF THE TIGER, BY WATER.

To the EDITOR of the CALCUTTA PAPER.

SIR,

THE survey on which my brother and I are employed, having of late occupied our attention to the largest rivers in the Sunderbunds, we have in general anchored at a considerable distance from the shore, but as the season is fast approaching approaching which generally sets in with gales of wind, we became anxious to have a place of comparative safety to run into. For this reason, on the 17th of March, we came to the mouth of a tolerably sized nullah, our distance from the shore and the nullah being about two hundred and fifty yards, perhaps more. The night passed quietly; but a little before four in the morning, the fleet, consisting of eight boats, was alarmed by the crew of one of them calling out that a tiger had come on board; this we could scarcely credit, believing that some one had merely dreamed such a thing; but the continued noise of the crew convinced us there was some foundation for their alarms. A shot or two were fired in the direction of the boat, with the hope of frightening away the animal; to have fired into the boat would have been dangerous; my brother and I, with a guard of Sepoys and a lanthern, went in a small boat to render all the assistance in our power. On reaching the patella, which was in distress, we learned that the tiger had quitted the boat, but it was much feared that the Jemadar was either killed or carried off. The Sepoys, with fixed bayonets, then boarded the patella, and carrying the lanthern, searched among the water casks. Here, in a kind of cabin, the Jemadar was found dead, with one half his throat and neck gone. The tiger had actually escaped; but for fear of a second alarm, while the fleet was in confusion, we fired some rounds into the jungle, from whence the tiger had issued. I moved the boats further off, and day beginning to break, the fears of the people subsided. The Jemadar was the officer in charge of a detachment of Buckadaurs, a stout man full six feet high. The people being more collected in their minds, we learned the following particulars from the Moonshee who slept at the side of the Jemadar. While preparing themselves for rest the preceding night, the Jemadar complained of the heat, and desired that one of the tatties at his side might be opened; after which all the party slept, excepting two Chokadars, who kept watch. They were sitting near a fire which served for a lamp. A little before four o'clock, they heard a noise in the water, but thought it had been made by a fish; the noise becoming louder they gave the alarm, but it was now too late; the people began to make a fresh alarm and to run out. When the Moonshee first raised his head from the pillow, he saw half the tiger's body in at the opening from which the tatty had been removed. At this moment, the Jemadar rose, and was seized by the throat; the Moonshee made his escape with the other people to the top of a chupper, making as much noise as they possibly could in hopes of frightening the tiger, but he remained in the boat fifteen minutes. They imagine he must have fallen down to the bottom of the vessel, and getting among the casks could not again find his way out; but when our muskets were fired, he escaped on the opposite side to that which he had entered. On examining the Jemadar's body, there was no other wound in it than that of the throat, and his right arm was broken in two places, which I imagine must have been done by the animal attempting to carry him away. The Moonshee, and the others, who saw the tiger, say, he was a very large one, his head, head, neck, and shoulders, being enormous. The circumstance of his getting into the boat is indeed most extraordinary; had there been any thing hanging overboard which he could have laid hold of, the difficulty would in a manner vanish; but he had no assistance, and the time he chose most proper for the attack was low water, when there was not the least current. The Jemadar has left a wife and two children to lament his loss.

THE FRENCHMAN AND HIS FIDDLE.

A Performer of the name of Boucher, who lately came over to push his professional fortune in England, on his arrival at Dover had the mortification to see his case of fiddles seized by that inharmonic band the officers of the customs. It was in vain he protested that they were not articles of commerce, but instruments for his own use, and that if he meant to make money by them, it was at least not by their sale. The fiscal agents were deaf, having no more ear for instruments than for music; the fiddles must pay duty. To fix their amount their value must be estimated, and Mr. Boucher desired to set his own value on the fiddles; he fell into the snare, and fixed a very moderate price. Then, in virtue of custom-house regulations, unknown to our travelling musician, they offered him fifteen per cent. more than the valuation, and declared they would keep the instruments. Our artist complained, prayed, and threatened, but all in vain; there was only one resource, that of going to London to claim the interference of the French Ambassador; but to do this he must part from his dear fiddles, the instruments of his glory and his fortune. He wished at least to bid them a last adieu, and taking up one of them, he brought from it such melodious but doleful sounds as corresponded with his feelings. Attracted by the notes, the people assembled, formed a group around him, which gradually increased, so that the office could no longer contain the collected auditors. They begged the musician to pass into a large lobby that they might the better hear him, to which he willingly assented. There, mounted on a step of the staircase, he performed several pieces, which at length charmed even fiscal ears. Animated by his success, the artist surpassed even himself, and the enthusiasm of the audience was at its height when they heard God save the King executed with the most brilliant variations. How repay so much talent and complaisance? Every thing was forgotten, even the regulations of the Custom-house. "Sir," said the chief of the Customs to the French virtuoso, "take back your fiddles; you may boast of a finer, because a more difficult triumph, than that of Orpheus. He melted only the infernal deities, but you have even made the douaniers of Dover relent.

DEATH OF THE OTTER.

OTTER hunting, though a sport at present but little pursued, was formerly in constant practice, and is said to have been once in great estimation; it is still continued in some remote fenny districts, but in general is principally confined to those parts where, from local circumstances, the other more noble pursuits of the stag, fox, and hare cannot be easily enjoyed.—The present Etching is by Howitt.

FEAST OF WIT.

A Few days since, two tradesmen discoursing over their evening libation, one of them remarked upon the unpleasantness of having occasion either to pass along Broker's-row, Moor-fields, or Monmouth-street.—" Why?" said the other; " Because," he replied, " you are so plagued either with, do you want any furniture—or do you want to purchase any clothes, that it's a complete gauntlet to run, and fatiguing to answer all their questions."—" I do not recollect having been so plagued," said the other—" and I think I might venture a wager that I would pass along Monmouth-street any hour in the day without being once interrupted." The consequence of this reply was the wager of a rump and dozen—and Thursday, the 23d instant, it was decided. The gentleman who undertook the task, accompanied by umpires, proceeded to Monmouth-street, when taking out an ink-horn he fastened it to his button-hole: then, with a large account book in his hand, he proceeded on at a slow rate, and completely passed down the street, and back on the opposite side, without being once accosted, the shopkeepers regularly retreating as he advanced, under the impression of his being a collector of taxes.

On a Peasant being told that his bones should rise again.

" What! rise again with all my bones,"
Quoth Giles, " I hope you fib;

To satirize unequal marriages, a moral writer relates a fable, that a goat being once tired of associating with beasts, went into a city, where, from his length of beard, and affected gravity, he was taken for a Philosopher. Meeting one day with an elderly Magistrate, who had just married a young wife, he saluted him with uncommon respect, and hailed him as a brother. The Magistrate, curious to know the reason of this supposed affinity, was stopped in his enquiries by the goat's observation, that he was already provided with a beard, and that he had no doubt he would very shortly be furnished with horns.

A CHIMNEY sweeper's boy went lately into a baker's shop in the Strand for a twopenny loaf, and conceiving it to be diminutive in size, he remarked to the baker, that he did not believe it was weight. " Never mind that," replied the man of dough, " you will have the less to carry."—" True," rejoined the lad, and throwing three halfpence on the counter, left the shop. The baker called after him, that he had not paid money enough. " Never mind that," hallooed young sooty, " you will have the less to count."

ON THE NEW WINE TAX.

So many heavy duties laid
On Wine, will surely spoil the trade;
Yet to the thirsty Sot, perchance,
The hardest duty's temperance.

DEAN COWPER, of Durham, was very saving of his wine. Descanting ing one day when in residence, on the extraordinary performances of a man who was blind, he remarked that the poor fellow could see no more than "that bottle."—"I do not wonder at all, Sir," replied Mr. Drake (a witty minor canon), "I do not wonder at all, Mr. Dean; for we have seen no more than 'that bottle' all the afternoon!"

Long and Short Tails.—A person asked a farmer what he must give him to take his horses to grass? "Why," said the farmer, "for long-tailed horses four shillings, and for bobtails, six per week." The person wondered at the difference of the charge, which the farmer at his desire explained. "The reason is this; in the hot weather the long tails are so busy in switching the flies, that they have not time to eat so much as the others; but the bob-tails have nothing else to do!"

The late Captain O'Byrne of gambling memory, having made a bet on the subject of Admiral Payne, wrote the following note to him:—

"Dear Payne—Pray were you bread to the sea?"

To which the following answer was returned:—

"Dear O'Byrne—No; but the sea was bread to me."

The high duties lately imposed on bachelors, reduces them to this extremity, that they must either "play or pay."

Bon Mot.—Mr. Jekyl meeting his friend Lord Erskine, said, "May I congratulate you, my Lord, on having the Green riband?"—"Yes," answered his Lordship, "but I am the same man still:"—"then," replied the facetious barrister, "it will be a more manifest sign of your deserts, and therefore you must be the Green Man and Still."

Appropriate Engraving on a Seal.—For letters of business, an eminent merchant has adopted an engraving for his office seal, which, at first sight, appears to be merely a text from the Bible, viz. I. Maccabees, chap. xii. v. 18; but being referred to, these words appear at length:—"Therefore now ye will do well to give us an answer thereunto."

Legal Anecdote.—Mr. M'Nally, the Irish Barrister, was at the English Bar, during a part of the time that the Earl of Mansfield presided in the Court of King's Bench. It is well known that his Lordship entertained a particular bias on political questions that came before him, nor was he partial to the learned gentleman's volubility. A trial came on in the sittings after term, in which Mr. M'Nally was retained. In the course of it, the defendant, who had a large wen on the lower part of one of his cheeks, begged leave to address the Court, which he did very much in the style of the Barrister. The Chief Justice then significantly remarked, "That man would make a pleader."—"May I be permitted to ask why your Lordship thinks so," interrogated the latter.—"Because," replied the Judge, "he is all jaw."—"True, my Lord," rejoined the advocate, "and he might afterwards be called up to the Bench, as his qualifications lie all on one side!"

When Miss Mellon (recently mar-married to the venerable Mr. Coutts, the banker) first drew the attention of the Green Rooms, by the splendour of an equipage and a villa, report gave it forth, "that she had got a prize in the lottery," and every one believed it. It now seems she has drawn a capital prize indeed, though some of the theatrical ladies will have it that her prize will prove a blank.

THE character which a certain actress appeared in lately, is said not to have much novelty in it—only new dresses and decorations.

INGENUITY!—The following circumstance has been handed to us as a recent fact:—A farmer in a village in a Western county, long celebrated for lunar speculations, was lately engaged in adjusting his brewing materials; but found considerable difficulty in endeavouring to refasten a head to a barrel which he had just cleaned. At last a lucky thought struck him—he took up his son, who stood by, and put him into the barrel, to hold the head while it was fixed on. This expedient succeeded admirably—but the poor farmer was soon put to his trumps again, by hearing his lad exclaim—"Feyther, Feyther, how be I to get out?"

KING James the First gave all manner of encouragement to the exercise of buffoonery, and took great delight in it himself. Happening one day to bear rather hard on one of his Scotch courtiers—"by my soul, returned the Peer, he who made your Majesty a King, spoiled the best fool in Christendom."

THE RUSTIC RHYMIST.—Our learned poet, Ben Jonson, passing one day along Fleet-street, near the then Devil Tavern, observing the eyes of a country bumpkin stedfastly fixed on the window of a grocer's, gently tapped him on the shoulder, and inquired what so particularly attracted his attention?—"Why, master," replied Ralph, "I be admiring that nice poetry over the shop."—"How can you make that rhyme," replied Ben, "the words are—Coffee and Tea to be Sold." Thus, answered the rustic—

Coffee and Tea,
To be, S—o—l—d.

The poet was so pleased with the thought, that he took Ralph immediately into his service, in which he continued until Jonson's death.

A POOR woman complaining of having lost her cup in the crowd, "Never mind," cried a wag, "won't a mob do as well?"

AN undertaker waited on a gentleman with the bill for the burial of his wife, amounting to 67l.—"That's a vast sum (said the widower) for laying a silent female horizontally! you must have made some mistake!"—"Not in the least (answered the coffin-monger), handsome hearse—three coaches and six—well-dressed mutes—handsome pall—nobody, your honour, could do it for less." The gentleman rejoined: "It is a large sum, Mr. Crape; but as I am satisfied the poor woman would have given twice as much to bury me, I must not be behind her in an act of kindness; there is a cheque for the amount."

SPORT-

SPORTING INTELLIGENCE.

THE Honner grey Arabian will cover this season, at some convenient place, within a moderate distance of London, of which immediate notice will be given. The terms favourable to the breeder, on the consideration of its being the horse's first season of covering in England, The colt by this horse out of the Duke of Grafton's Rattle, is going into training, being his first produce from a racing mare. Notice will be given of the time and place of covering of the Honner blood bay Arabian.

THE Spadille mare (dam of X Y Z) was lately shot, by order of her owner, Mr. Ord, supposed not in foal, but on being examined, she had a very fine filly in her, by Marmion.—And Mr. J. W. Wilson's Hambletonian mare (dam of Bosville), was lately drowned by falling into a ditch, with a colt in her, by Whitworth.

THE Hon. T. O. Powlett, of Bolton Hall, near Middleham, has purchased of Henry Peirse, Esq. of Bedale, Yorkshire, a bay mare, by Pipator, dam by Delpini, out of Tuberose, with a colt by her side, by Comus; and has also purchased two two-years old colts, and two yearling colts, of Mr. J. W. Wilson.—And the Earl of Darlington lately purchased of Mr. J. W. Wilson, a remarkably fine colt, by Whitworth, out of Bosville's dam.

THE sporting world will be happy to hear, that Sir M. M. Sykes has determined to continue his celebrated pack of fox-hounds on the same establishment as usual.

PYTCHLEY HUNT RACES.—On Wednesday, the 15th instant, a Cup of Fifty Pounds value, was run for on the Northampton Course. Six horses were entered.

In a few minutes after Mr. Wakefield's gelding had run in, he fell down, and immediately died.

THE Pytchley hounds have had an unremitted continuance of great sport since the frost, having scarcely missed killing a fox. Lords Althorpe and Barnard, Sirs C. Knightly and Barnard, Messrs. Cooke, Hervey, Alix, Davey, Gurney, Walles, Nethercoat and Jones, are among the very hard riders of that hunt.

THE Oakley hunt has been exceedingly well attended throughout the season, and is daily increasing in celebrity.

THE Berkeley Fox Hounds had an excellent run on Tuesday, the 7th instant. They threw off at Ryslip, and finding immediately in Park Wood, broke covert across Ryslip new inclosures to the copse, from thence back again into Park Wood,

Wood, where reynard kept dodging about, and it was thought advisable to call the hounds off the scent, as he was not likely to afford any sport, and go to Batchworth Heath coverts and try for a fresh fox; here another was immediately found, which went away to Major Hailey's covert, across the inclosures to Mad Bess Wood; here he was so closely pressed, that he made a short head back to the copse; this resource availing him little, he was compelled to break covert, and went away over the inclosures to Mr. Partridge's, across the Park to Harefield Place, over the road to the Grand Junction Canal, thence over Harefield Moor, crossed the river Colne, and along the vast chain of Denham coverts, which he went through without making a double, then away over the open country to Hornhill, through Mr. Bache's coverts, Mr. W. Sedgwick's furze, and then over the extensive open country to Ashpit Wood; from thence he crossed the turnpike road to Loudwater, and along the river side nearly to Garrat Mill, crossing the stream; here he eluded the vigilance of his pursuers, after an excellent run of two hours and twenty-three minutes.

PLYMPTON, MARCH 23.—On Monday, the 20th of this month, Mr. Pode's excellent harriers unkennelled a fox on Penmoor, near Hentor Rock, and after a chase of twelve miles without check, ran him to earth in Partown Wood. This lasted forty minutes.

ROYAL COURSING.—On Monday, the 20th inst. Lord Rivers, one of the Lords of the King's Bedchamber, arrived at Windsor Castle. Ten brace of fine young greyhounds came at the same time, belonging to his Lordship. The next morning the Noble Lord coursed with them in the Little Park, which attracted a great concourse of spectators to see the sport, in which the Queen and Princesses participated soon after the commencement, and saw some excellent runs. The hares were very numerous. The only horsemen were Lord Rivers, his servants, and General Taylor. Several hares were killed. None of the dogs were more than twelve months old.—On Thursday, the 23d, his Lordship's dogs again coursed in the Little Park, in the presence of numerous spectators. The hares invariably took to the plantations on the stops, where the dogs cannot follow them.

Extraordinary long Fox Chase with the Pembrokeshire Fox Hounds.—They found at Court Kenlas, went through Landshipping, leaving Cresselly two miles to the right, a mile past Jeffreston, and two back; across Martletwy, Herbeston, Landeguinney, Begelley, Turnaside, Saundersfoot; back across Begelley, and the same ground under Jeffreston, to earth, a distance not less than fifty miles. The greatest part of the sportsmen's horses were left in different parts of the country, not being able to continue the hard day's chase; after which they partook of a sumptuous dinner at Orielton, the residence of Sir John Owen, Bart. and spent the evening in mirth and harmony.

COLONEL Berkeley met with a serious accident a short time ago, whilst following the Berkeley hounds; his horse leaped a fence, on the other side of which was a deep deep stone pit, full of water. The Colonel seeing his danger, instantly disengaged himself from the stirrups, and threw himself off on a heap of stones, from which he again mounted and pursued his sport; but on return to the Castle, it was discovered that he had fractured the small bone of one of his legs. Mr. Augustus Berkeley took the same leap, and fell in the water, but sustained no injury, the ducking excepted.

THE number of foxes killed by regular hunting during the present season, is said to be greater than has been known for many years past.

ON Friday, the 24th ult. John Demaine, residing near Hopper-lane, in the parish of Fewstone, Yorkshire, now in the 104th year of his age, ran at a fox-hunt with great vigour, in a new dress provided for the occasion by Mr. W. Dunnel!

ON Wednesday, the 22d ult. Lord Yarborough's fox-hounds had one of the finest runs ever remembered. The hounds met on that day at Horkstow Warren, where some gentlemen from the Holderness and Nottinghamshire hunts were found in readiness, together with a numerous field of others from the neighbourhood of Stamford, consisting in the whole of upwards of sixty, of sporting celebrity. Having previously scoured the above warren, without success, they put into Bonby Cover, where an old grey fox soon made a start. The uncommon fineness of the day, added to the gay attire of the dashing assemblage, rendered it a peculiarly gratifying sight, rarely exhibited in that part of the country.—The snortings and neighings of the restless steeds, shewed a prognostication and participation of the felicity that awaited their riders, and all hearts animated on the occasion moved off in eager pursuit of the wily object. After a very smart burst of twenty minutes, Reynard fell a victim to the merciless hounds near Kingsforth House.—Another fox was afterwards tried for at Barrow Blackmold and the adjoining covers, but without effect. The hounds were then put into Burnham cover, when a fine fox, disturbed by the sound of the mellow-tôned horn, immediately stole away, and in a few minutes the whole field exultingly dashed off in the most gallant style, at full speed. Reynard made directly over the race ground and past the mill to Wooton House, then crossing the lawn there, he ran into Thornton, over the strong inclosures in front of Thornton House, down to the College, when taking a turn to the left, he entered Goxhill lordship, leading across the inclosures to the farmstead of a person at that place, who happening to be at home, fixed himself in his gateway, and with uplifted spade and Stentorian lungs vowed destruction to any one who dared to enter his grounds. After a short time at fault, in consequence of this altercation, the hounds again hit off the scent, when Reynard, taking a direction parallel to the Halton Beck Drain, crossed it at Mr. Dickinson's bridge, and turning round the front of his house in East Halton field, made direct for the Humber; after traversing the banks of which, he again attempted to reach the up-country, but being headed and much pressed by the hounds, he again pushed forward to the marshes along the Humber, and and crossing those of Killingholme and Haburgh, he was fairly run into at Immingham, and died with a resolution that surprised the few who were witnesses of the scene.—Six only out of the sixty, who were up at Gox-hill, were in at the death—amongst whom was Mr. Smith the huntsman, who, though in the 70th year of his age, rode the whole of the chase with all the ardour of youth, and never appeared in higher animation, health, and spirits.—The circuit, comprehending the windings and retrograde movements of the perambulators, was upwards of twenty miles, and was performed in an hour and a half—which, considering the heavy state of the country at this season of the year, offered a full and fair opportunity to the whole hunt, of trying the strength and bottom of their horses.

THE Prince Regent's Stag-hounds had on Friday, the 24th ult. one of the best runs in all its points, that has been witnessed this season; they met at the Pied Horse, at Slough, Bucks, and the deer was turned into a small cover at Wexham; but he was headed by the foot people, and came back nearly in a straight direction to the hounds, which did away with their intention of drawing awhile to amuse Sportsmen: the hounds were laid on, but from the number of foot spectators and the circumstances of a dog having chased him, the hounds did not settle to the scent till they reached Ditton Park; from thence to Colnbrook, was a sharp burst, where they were stopped to let in the tail hounds; the next burst was not quite so sharp and severe, owing to the number of brooks between Colnbrook and Denham; from the latter place to Hillingdon Heath, and on to Harrow-on-the-Hill, it was severe beyond any thing seen before; those who were fortunate enough to be with the hounds when they left the Heath, had the only chance of being in at the close, and it is supposed that when the deer was taken, the string of sportsmen reached near five miles. The chase lasted two hours and twenty minutes; the deer was taken in a pond close to the village of Harrow.

SINGULAR CIRCUMSTANCE.—A pair of pigeons having taken up their abode in a dwelling house in the village of Ugston, by Lauder, built a nest there, in which the hen laid two eggs. During the time of her incubation, an intimacy commenced between her and the family cat, which soon became so close, that they were very seldom seen apart, and it is a fact, that as often as the pigeon left the nest, the cat took her place. Thus matters proceeded till the pigeons were hatched, when puss's predilection for the offspring became as apparent as it had been for the mother, and continued till they were full fledged, when a painful separation ensued—painful as it respected puss; but, regardless of her feelings, they took up their ordinary residence in the roof. Hither the inconsolable cat's eyes were often directed. Unable, however, to brook a separation longer, she clambered up to their abode, and, with evident satisfaction, seated herself contiguous to them.

ON Wednesday, the 8th instant, four of Lord Yarborough's fox-hounds suddenly died, after a short run of two miles. One of them had been observed to take up and eat a sort of red pasty ball, when at Barrow Hunt Cover; there being therefore strong suspicion that some evil disposed person or persons had laid poison therein, a handsome reward has been offered by the subjoined advertisement to any person who shall give information of the offender or offenders :—

" Fifty Guineas Reward.—Whereas, on Wednesday last, after a short run of two miles, four of Lord Yarborough's fox-hounds suddenly died ; and from the circumstance of one of the hounds being observed to take up and eat a sort of red pasty ball when at Barrow Hann Cover, there is every suspicion that some evil disposed person or persons had, for some wicked purpose or other, laid poison therein : taking therefore into consideration, the serious consequence which might ensue from poisonous ingredients being secretly laid on open property as above, I, as owner of the lands and grounds wherein the above cover is situated, do hereby offer a reward of fifty guineas to any one who will give information of the person or persons concerned in the above nefarious transaction, so that they may be brought to conviction, on which conviction the money shall be paid.

" WM. GRABURN."

Kingsforth, Barton-upon-Humber, 11th March, 1815."

" FURTHER REWARD.

" The Gentlemen of the Yarborough Hunt, feeling the many high obligations they are under to Lord Yarborough for the diversion they and the whole country enjoy through his noble hunting establishment ; and in some measure to shew the indignation they feel at the diabolical attempt that has been made, as they conceive, to counteract their sport (without entering into the other more serious parts of the case), have opened a subscription for the purpose, and I am authorised to offer a reward of fifty guineas, in addition to the above, making in the whole one hundred guineas reward, for the conviction of the offender or offenders in the above most infamous transaction.

" MARMADUKE GRABURN."

Mrs. Coutts (the ci-devant actress) late Miss Mellon, now sports a simply elegant carriage, drawn by four beautiful bays. Her coachman was trying his skill one day this month, with some dexterity, as a four-in-hand whip, through several of the streets in the vicinity of New Drury.

Horse Racing.—Wednesday, the 1st instant, a long depending match was decided in Lord Suffield's Park at Blickling, Norfolk, between three horses, belonging to Mr. Sheppard and Mr. Roper, of Coleby, and Mr. Wright, of Aylsham—the best of three one-mile heats for 45l. which was won by Mr. Sheppard's horse, the second heat, Mr. Roper's horse being distanced in the first.—A second race was run for a less sum, between two horses, belonging to Mr. Gay, of Oulton, and Mr. Smith, of Aylsham, which was won by the former.

Essex Assizes.—Shuttleworth v. Tarling and Another.—This was an action against the defendants for shooting at and wounding the plaintiff's dog, and also for assaulting the plaintiff. The circumstances were clearly proved, and the Jury found a verdict for the plaintiff.—Damages 20l.

Court of King's Bench, Feb. 25.—Levi v. Negus.—This was an action brought by the plaintiff, a Jew, to recover 30l. alledged to have been deposited by him in the hands of defendant, as a wager, to abide the event of the fight between Knowlesworthy and Dutch Sam. Upon the part of defendant, it was proved that the sum in question had been deposited with him by a man of the name of Jones, and not by plaintiff. It was likewise proved, that plaintiff, although at the fight, never talked of betting. Verdict for defendant.

Pugilism.——Gregson, who fought Gully, has challenged Shaw, who is open to all the world, to fight in June, for one hundred guineas, which challenge has been accepted.

On Monday and Tuesday, the 27th and 28th of February, a main of cocks was fought between Norwich and North Walsham, at the Lobster Inn, in Norwich. The sport was better than ever was known, and Norwich won by two battles.

Valuable Dog.—The crew of the Durham packet, of Sunderland, lately wrecked near Clay, in Norfolk, were saved in the following remarkable manner :—A faithful dog used his efforts to bring the lead line on shore from the vessel; but there being a very heavy sea on, and a steep beach, it appeared the draw-back of the surf was too power-powerful for the animal to contend with. Mr. Parker, ship-builder, of Wells, and Mr. Jackson, jun. of Clay, who were on the spot, observing this, instantly rushed into the sea, which was running very high, and gallantly succeeded, though at much risk, in catching hold of the dog, who was much exhausted, but who had all this time kept the line in his mouth; which being obtained, a communication with the vessel was established, and a warp being thus passed from the ship to the shore, the lives of all on board (nine in number, including two children) were saved.

In the parish records of ———, in Derbyshire, it is stated that a hunted stag, after a long chase, passed through a meadow near the village, where a stallion colt was grazing, who immediately pursued him, and having overtaken him, tore the stag to pieces before the hounds or huntsman could come up. This was communicated by the late worthy character, the Rev. Mr. Otter, to the writer of this recollection of a very extraordinary occurrence. The name of the village has unfortunately escaped his memory.

Humanity towards Animals.—The Rev. J. Troupe, Rector of St. Martin's, in Cornwall, the celebrated classical editor, presented an amiable and remarkable example of kindness to dumb animals. The children of his tenants were restrained from taking birds' nests on his extensive glebe of St. Martin's, as well as from confining birds in cages; the cow that had long supplied his family with milk was preserved from being killed, and supported during her old age with the tenderest care; and the faithful dog, who had for years guarded his court-yard, when too old to serve the office of keeper of the premises, was admitted to the comforts of the parlour, which he enjoyed till he died. This pleasing trait of character was associated with all the higher virtues. Mr. Troupe was as religious as he was learned, and exemplified the Christian graces which he taught to others, in his own conduct. He died 19th of January, 1785, not less regretted by the world of letters, than by the more confined sphere of his parishioners and friends, who had benefited by his example.

The following circumstance shews the ferocious nature of those destructive animals, rats:—In Howgill, near Sedberg, a few days ago, a farmer went into his barn to take up the remainder of a corn mow, when, to his astonishment, after removing a few sheaves, he perceived an immense number of rats to issue from among the corn; the man had the presence of mind (after four had escaped) to fasten up the whole, and all the holes that were likely to afford an escape, or asylum, for the destroyers of his property; a severe conflict took place betwixt the man and the remainder of the vermin, both parties attacking and occasionally retreating; he, after a great deal of labour, laid prostrate fifty-three, though not without running a great hazard of being bitten, as they attempted several times to fly in his face, when hard pressed.—(Carlisle Journal.)

A Curious Combat.—On Sunday evening, the 5th instant, as a man and boy were passing through a field, a field, near Malling House, they observed two ravens in the air engaged in a sharp conflict; after some little time the sable combatants alighted on the ground, and continued the engagement with so much vigour that they both suffered themselves to be taken alive by the boy, who seized them by their necks, and bore them off in triumph.

The following extraordinary occurrence happened lately at Barlby, near Selby:—Mr. Thomas Hubie had put two large oxen into his fold yard, who soon found means to get out of their confinement, by breaking a door that hung at the bottom of a flight of stone steps, leading to a granary, the landing of which is about ten feet high, and is even with the roof of an old thatched barn, upon which both the animals stepped from the landing, and walked about half way up to the ridge, and then taking a horizontal direction for ten or twelve yards, stood side by side for a considerable time; one of them was so sensible of his danger that the sweat dropped from him. Mr. Hubie now placed some clover on the same landing, the sight of which brought one of them to the spot, who very deliberately walked down the steps without the least injury; the other followed the same way with great difficulty, but with a little assistance also reached the ground in safety. It is the more astonishing that they did not break through the roof, as when fat they will each weigh about ninety stone, and from the internal appearance of the barn, it is little more than sufficient to carry the thick coat of thatch that covers it.

Lately died, after a lingering illness, Mr. Thomas Carr, of Hednesford, Staffordshire, the celebrated jockey and trainer of blood horses.

The Prince of Aremberg killed, being thrown from his Horse.—This Prince, who died at Vienna on the 7th instant, lost his life by the following accident:—A very spirited horse, which he was riding in St. Joseph's-square, knocked down a woman. The Prince, with much difficulty, succeeded in stopping his horse, and alighted to inquire into the situation of the woman, who had fortunately received no serious injury, though she was greatly alarmed. The young Prince again mounted his horse, which appeared tranquil, but shortly afterwards reared and threw his rider. His head was nearly laid open, and the horse, with a single kick, broke several of his ribs. He was carried in a lifeless state to the house of his brother-in-law, Prince Schwartzenberg. This accident calls to mind those which have already taken place in the same family.—The father of the young Prince received, when hunting, a gun-shot in his eye, by which he was deprived of sight; his mother was guillotined; his brother was forced to banish himself in consequence of a duel, in which he had the misfortune to kill his adversary; and finally, his sister perished in the fire which broke out in the house of Prince Schwartzenberg, at Paris.

POETRY.

THE HIGH COURT OF DIANA.

LINES ON THE BATTLE OF VITTORIA.

"Dux fortis pugnabit et vincet."
EXEMPLA MINORA.

To the Editor of the Sporting Magazine.

SIR,

THE subjoined copy of verses is re-verà the masterly production of a school-master, a Scotchman, who resides in a country town, not a hundred miles from Huntingdon. In perusing them, I must beg of you, though I fear in vain, "risum tenere."

The pedantic knight of the birchen caduceus, who had the highest opinion of his own poetical effusions, asked a friend what he thought of his "Vittoria Pæan?" His friend answered, with an arch equivoque, "Why, as I suppose it's your first attempt"—"Hauld your tongue, mon," said Mac, "I wa boorn a poeet."

Whether his essay possesses any of the spirit of Dryden, or the harmonious versification of Pope, I leave you to judge:—A copy accidentally fell into my hands, and thinking it a pity so sublime an effort of genius should be lost to the world, I have transcribed it verbatim et literatim, for the edification and amusement of your readers. TRIM.

"Splendid, glorious, and immortal fame,
Has crown'd eternally the allies' name;
Servility and avarice they've restrain'd,
By victories heroic they have obtain'd.
Hail, Britons! hail the auspicious day,
On which you've overcome proud sons of clay.
By your valour thousands of French were slain,
That never shall return to fight again!
The Saxons from the Frenchmen ran away*
That they may live to fight another day;
Gallican veterans were put to flight,
God knowing our friends to be in the right;
He protected them where'er they went,
Wisdom and Omnipotence to them he lent.
In every change and situation,
Right overcomes an avaricious nation.
May providential care protect our laws,
May Britons and Allies adhere to the cause;
May Omniscient wisdom stablish peace
In every kingdom of the universe;
Then to God, our hearts with rev'rence raise,
With unceasing acclamations praise
Him for the victories we shall adore,
And rejoice in happiness for evermore."

ODE ON A COLLEGE FEAST DAY.

HARK! heard ye not yon footsteps dread,
That shook the hall with thund'ring tread?
With eager haste
The fellows pass'd,
Each intent on direful work,
High lifts his mighty blade, and points his deadly fork.

But hark! the portals sound, and pacing forth,
With steps, alas! too slow,

* To assist the allies.

The

The college gips of high illustrious worth,
With all the dishes in long order go;
In the midst, a form divine,
Appears the fam'd sirloin,
And soon, with plums and glory crown'd.
A mighty pudding sheds its sweets around,
Heard ye the din of dinner bray?
Knife to fork, and fork to knife;
Unnumber'd heroes in the glorious strife,
Through fish, flesh, pies, and puddings, cut their destin'd way.

See beneath the mighty blade,
Gor'd with many a ghastly wound,
Low the fam'd sirloin is laid,
And sinks in many a gulph profound.
Arise, arise, ye sons of glory,
Pies and puddings stand before ye;
See the ghosts of angry bellies,
Point at yonder stand of jellies;
While such dainties are beside ye,
Snatch the goods the gods provide ye;
Mighty rulers of this state,
Snatch, before it is too late;
For, swift as thought, the puddings, jellies, pies,
Contract their giant bulks, and shrink to pigmy size.

From the table now retreating,
All around the fire they meet,
And, with wine, the sons of eating
Crown at length their mighty treat;
Triumphant plenty's rosy graces,
Sparkle in their jolly faces;
And mirth and cheerfulness are seen,
In each countenance serene.
Fill high the sparkling glass,
And drink th' accustom'd toast;
Drink deep, ye mighty host,
And let the bottle pass.
Begin, begin, the jovial strain,
Fill, fill, the mystic bowl,
And drink, and drink, and drink again,
For drinking fires the soul.
But soon, too soon, with one accord, they reel,
Each on his seat begins to nod,
All conquering Bacchus' power they feel,
And pour libations to the jolly god.
At length with dinner and with wine oppress'd,
Down in the chairs they sink, and give themselves to rest.

THE PRESENT AGE.

NO more, my friends, of vain applause,
Nor complimental rhymes;
Come Muse, let's call another cause,
And sing about the times.

For of all ages ever known,
The present is the oddest;
As all the men are honest grown,
And all the women modest.

No lawyers now are fond of fees,
Nor clergy of their dues;
Few people at the play one sees,
At church what crowded pews!

No courtiers now their friends deceive
With promises of favour;
For what they make 'em once believe,
They faithfully endeavour.

Our nobles!—Heav'n defend us all!
I'll nothing say about 'em;
For they are great, and I'm but small,
So muse, jog on without 'em.

The ladies dress so plain, indeed,
You'd think 'em Quakers all;
Witness the hampers on their head,
So comely! and so small.

Our frugal taste the state secures,
Whence then can woe begin?
For luxury's turn'd out of doors,
Frugality took in.

Hence all the plenty of the times!
Hence all provisions cheap!
Hence dearth of follies and of crimes!
Hence all complaints asleep.

Vile cuckold-making is forgot;
No ladies now in keeping;
No debtors in our prisons rot!
No creditors a weeping!

No pleasure chaises fill the street,
Or crowd the roads on Sunday;
So horses lab'ring through the week,
Obtain a respite one day.

Happy the nation thus endow'd!
So void of want and crimes!
All zealous for their neighbour's good,
Oh! these are glorious times!

Your character! (with wond'ring stare,
Says Tom) is mighty high, Sir;
But pray forgive me, if I swear,
I think 'tis all a lie, Sir!

Ah!

Ah! think you so, my honest clown?
Then take another light on't;
Just turn the picture upside down,
I fear you'll see the right on't.

O. W.

THE LARK.

FROM callow young, and downy rest,
The tuneful Lark now leaves his nest;
Cheerful he spreads his glossy wings,
And rises higher as he sings.
By slow degrees he mounts the sky;
At length eludes the searching eye.
Still more remote, and more remote,
Is faintly heard his twitt'ring note.

A pause ensues—but hark! again
Methinks I hear the distant strain,
That with the æther seems to play,
Descending down the beams of day.
Now pois'd upon the waving air,
Again his notes are shrill, but clear;
Now dropping culls his insect food,
And helps to tend the callow brood.

ON PAPER.

SOME wit of old, (such wits of old there were,
Whose hints shew'd meaning, whose allusions care),
By one grave stroke to mark all human kind,
Call'd clear blank paper every infant mind;
Where still, as opening Sense her dictates wrote,
Fair Virtue put a seal, or Vice a blot.

The thought was happy, pertinent, and true;
Methinks a Genius might the plan pursue:
I—(can you pardon my presumption!) I,
No Wit, no Genius, yet for once will try.

Various the papers, various wants produce,
The wants of fashion, elegance, and use;
Men are as various, and, if right I scan,
Each sort of paper represents some man.

Pray, note the Fop, half powder and half lace,
Nice as a band-box were his dwelling-place:
He's the gilt paper, which apart you store,
And lock from vulgar hands in the scrutoire.

Mechanics, farmers, servants, and so forth,
Are copy paper of superior worth,
Less priz'd, more useful, for your desk decreed,
Free to all pens, and prompt at every need.

The Wretch whom av'rice bids to pinch and spare,
Starve, cheat, and pilfer, to enrich—an heir,
Is coarse brown paper, such as pedlars choose
To wrap up wares which better men will use.

Take next the Miser's contrast, who destroys
Health, fame, and fortune, in a round of joys;
Will any paper match him!—yes—throughout
He's the true sinking paper, past all doubt.

The retail Politician's anxious thought
Deems this side always right, and that stark nought.
He foams with censure; with applause he raves;
A dupe of rumours, and a tool of knaves;
He'll want no type his weakness to proclaim,
While such a thing as fool's cap has a name.

The hasty gentleman, whose blood runs high,
Who picks a quarrel if you step awry;
Who can't a jest, or hint, or look endure,
What is he?—What?—Touch paper to be sure.

What are our Poets, take 'em as they fall,
Good, bad, rich, poor, much read, not read at all!
Them and their works in the same class you'll find;
They are—the mere waste paper of mankind.

Observe the Maiden, innocently sweet!
She's fair white paper, an unsullied sheet;

On

On which the happy man, whom Fate ordains,
May write his name, and take her for his pains!

One instance more, and only one, I'll bring,
'Tis—the great man, who scorns a little thing;
Whose thoughts, whose deeds, whose maxims are his own,
Form'd on the feelings of his heart alone:
True genuine royal paper is his breast,
Of all the kinds most precious, purest, best!

TO RIDE OR NOT TO RIDE?

A Parody on "To be, &c."

TO ride or not to ride? that is the question:
Whether 'tis nobler in the mind to suffer
The jeers and scoffs of hair-brain'd jockies,
Or boldly mount the prancing steed,
And by advent'rous gallop end them?
To ride, to walk no more; and by a horse
Of stout abilities, to say we end
The heart-ache, and the thousand weary strides
The London cockney takes, 'tis a consummation
Devoutly to be wished. To ride—to fall—
Perchance to break one's neck; aye, there's the rub,
For in that ride what various ills may come,
When we have trotted on some few score miles,
Must give us pause—there's the respect
That makes the unwilling walker bear
The painful toil of padding all his life.
For who would bear the whips and taunts of coachmen,
The horse-dealer's wrong, the jockey's contumely,
The jokes of country girls, the buck's assurance,
The insolence of chairmen, and the spurns
Of brawny porters in the crowded streets,
When he himself might his quietus make
Upon a gentle poney? Who would fardles bear,
To groan and sweat under a heavy load?
But that the dread of ev'ry untried horse,
Whose undiscover'd humours and whose tricks
No traveller returns well pleased to tell,
And makes us rather walk in clouted shoes
Than fly to horses that we know not of.
Thus horror does make cowards of us all;
And thus the resolution of our riding
Is sicklied o'er with the pale cast of fear,
And beaux and cits, of genteel life and taste,
With this regard, from Tattersall's turn away,
And lose the name of horsemen.

IMPROMPTU,

On reading an account of a man who had had a piece of one of his fingers chopped off and put on again.

I'VE heard, Mr. Editor, doctors of old,
When a limb was cut off, grown lifeless and cold,
Suppos'd an adhesion again to the wound,
If it ever took place, would never be sound.
A finger cut off, then set on's, not amiss,
A fact who can doubt it, and who can doubt this?
When Broke fought the Yankees, a man with one arm
Found a leg just shot off—the blood running warm;
He pick'd up the limb, and then in a trice,
Express'd to the surgeon he wish'd for a splice;
And swore if it grew, no resentment he'd smother,
But kick with one hand and fight with the other,
The surgeon comply'd with his wishes, they tell,
And the leg to the shoulder grew on very well,

ON THE BUDGET.

VANSITTART! thy budget makes many repine;
The toper growls hard at the tax upon wine,
The merchant exclaims—all the tax on his trade is;
And the bachelors' tax pleases none—but the ladies.
